This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. "THE MESSIAH" ON NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Mr. Barnby, conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, gave a performance of "The Messiah," on the evening of Monday. The principal soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Mdme. Fassett, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Some of the choruses were encored, but only one was repeated: "Unto us a child is born." Mr. Santley declined a bis of "Why do the nations," and Miss Williams for the air of Part III., "I konw that my Redeemer liveth," where Handel, as in "Let the bright Seraphim," modulates so effectively into his subdominant key. The audience, for a New Year's night, was numerous.

MR. AGUILAR'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The second of these agreeable recitals was held on Wednesday afternoon, before a select and laudably reticent audience. Mr. Aguilar began well, with Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 31, No. 1, a remarkably beautiful inspiration of the great master, who is supposed by some quidnuncs to have "taken off" conventionalities of the modern Italian opera in the adagio, where, to speak truthfully, fioriture seems to flourish at the expense of idea. The Romeo Finale, so exquisite an inspiration in itself, might force admiration from auditors half asleep, or detain "fashionable females" from their carriages, if only for the beautiful imitation of the leading motif in the relative (E) minor.

Mr. Aguilar (to speak for the present of "past masters") afterwards played a Prelude and Fugue of old Sebastian Bach in G minor, which the ladies much liked.

Thalberg's Sonata in C minor, "Op. 56," requires more than one hearing, if one has not heard it before. With all due respect for the great Austrian pianist, so famous in London between the years 1840 and 1851, I must avow a dislike and a certain dread of him as a composer. When he borrows other men's ideas (as in opera), he does little more than show off what is called the "genius" of his own adopted instrument, after the old and effete "semiquaver splitting" fashion. This Sonata in C minor fails to create a craving for more of Thalberg's original composition, but Mr. Aguilar merits many thanks from the musical world for unshelving the dormant text, not necessarily dry, but dusty. The first movement of the sonata, seasoned with some national air, must be further studied, with a view to comprehension. The Scherzo Pastorale, in G minor and major, was admired by the audience. The andante Cantabile in A flat, an agreeable though not striking strain of genuine vocal music, is diluted by the treatment, far too extensive for so slender a subject. The finale, one of Thalberg's fire-eating bravuras, relieved by a tuneful "second theme," in B minor, is well worked up, with tremendous tours de force, and was thought by "outsiders" with whom I concur, to be the best of all the movements. All said and done, however, let it be admitted that Thalberg's forte was not invention. He lived on the hackneyed motif of modern Italian opera; and at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1842, his reception, however flattering on the whole, was "under protest."

Mr. Aguilar, at all events, must be thanked for thus ably illustrating a sonata that ought not to be forgotten, even if too difficult for ordinary pianists. The extraordinary ones may not condescend to take it up, and I don't think they will.

Mr. Aguilar played, in the course of the recital, several fugitive pieces, which were much admired. His own "Cheristana," a romantic and dramatic piece in F sharp minor and major, strikes one as a well-told story of tragical horrors, relieved by sunshiny glimpses of fairyland. The "Overture Scherzo" in E flat has been recently appraised.

The two short solos, "Contented" in A, and "Esmeralda" in D flat, always at these agreeable receptions flutter the gentle and somewhat too passive "doves of Corioli." The scheme was completed with two excerpts from the 5th Book of the "Lieder ohne Worte" (Nos. 1 and 2 in G and B flat); and Mr. Aguilar's own esquisses, short but sweet, viz., "Warning Day" in F, and "Away," a contradictory melodie in C, seeing that the audience decline to go away, and always want a repetition.

WATFORD.

During the evening service at St. Matthew's Church on St. John's Day, the first part of the "Messiah" was given by the Church Oratorio Society, which is comprised of the leading amateurs of Watford, Bushey, Rickmansworth, Harrow, Pinner, The Langleys, and other places in the vicinity. There was a very large congregation, who must have enjoyed the excellent performance of Handel's greatest work.

The soprano solos were safe in the hands of Miss Alice Brooks, who possesses all the qualities of voice and style which oratorio requires. Thus the manner in which the recitatives following the pastoral symphony were declaimed, and the devotional feeling imparted to "Come unto Him," were alike commendable, while "Rejoice greatly" was distinguished for its fervour and brilliant vocalization. Miss Barker, of Rickmansworth, was entrusted with the airs "O thou that tellest" and "He shall feed his flock," which were given with much sweetness. The recitative "Comfort ye" and the air "Every Valley" were carefully rendered by an amateur, and Mr. Charles Healey (one of the most successful students at the School of Music) gave the recitative "Thus saith the Lord," and the air "But who may abide," with great power and finish. The Rev. T. M. Everett, who also conducted, in the absence of Mr. J. Farmer, sang "The people that walked in darkness" with effect. With so fine a body of vocalists, most of whom were perfectly at home in their work, the choruses could not fail to receive justice. All the parts came out well, especially the alto. The rendering of "For unto us a child is born," and "Hallelujah," which terminated the selection, was particularly meritorious. Mr. James Turpin presided at the organ with his usual ability, his playing of the overture and the Pastoral Symphony being most impressive.—The Watford Observer.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Christmas, with its social festivities and enjoyments, has brought a welcome lull in the great activity of our musical season. The time-honoured and indispensable performance of "The Messiah" took place in the Town Hall, on December the 26th, and the usual invitation concerts were given by our Local Amateur Vocal Societies shortly before Christmas.

Mr. Henry Holmes will lead the string quartets at the next Chamber Concert, on January 16th, at the Assembly Rooms; and, for the last concert of the series, engagements are pending with Herr Joachim, Signor Piatti, and Miss Agnes Zimmermann.

Mr. Rea's second Subscription Concert will take place on January 23rd. The programme is a miscellaneous one. Mdme. Trebelli, Mons. Musin, Herr Ganz (pianoforte), etc., will appear as soloists. Mr. Rea's choir will perform part-songs under Mr. Rea's conductorship.

At Mr. Charles Hallé's third Orchestral Concert, in February, the following instrumental items will be performed:—Overture, "Der Freischütz" (Weber); "The Unfinished," Symphony B minor (Schubert); overture, "Leonora" (Beethoven); overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn); and Entr'act and Ballet (Schubert). Mr. Hallé will appear as pianist in Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto, in G major, "Nocturne" in G, and "Polonaise" in A flat, by Chopin.

Dr. Armes's oratorio, "St. John the Evangelist," was excellently performed at a concert in the Town Hall, on December 22nd. The talented composer wielded the bâton, and Mr. Albion Alderson presided at the organ. The choruses were performed by amateur singers, the soloists being Mdmes. Watford and Lewis, Mr. Welch and Mr. John Nutton. A collection in aid of the Royal College was taken during the interval. The second part of the programme contained Macfarren's "Christmas," which was also well performed on all hands.

Miss F. Hipwell, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Grice were the soloists at the people's concert, on December 30th. As the programmes for these concerts have in general contained too many ballads and royalty songs, I am pleased to note that "The Messiah" will be given at the concert this week.

At present the pantomimes reign supremely at our two theatres. As being an unusual thing, I ought to mention that "Blue Beard," performed at the Tyne Theatre, has been wedded to exceptional good and suitable music, by Mr. Leggatt, the musical director of the establishment.

OSWESTRY.

The Oswestry annual musical and literary festival was held at the Powis Hall, Oswestry, on January 1st. The morning proceedings opened with an address from the President, Major Barnes, after which the programme was gone through, in which several competitions took place. Among those of interest were the choral competitions of juvenile choirs of not more than twenty voices, the prize being won by Oswestry. The choral competition "Then round about the starry throne" was won by the Oswestry Harmonic Society. At night the second programme was gone through. Mr. Henry Leslie presided. Several competitions were given, among the principal being "The Reapers' Chorus," won by the Lodge Choir. The event of the day was a great choral competition for a prize of £25 and a silver medal to the conductor. The piece was "Thanks be to God," from "Elijah," for choirs of not less than forty voices, and was won by the Lodge and Bronygarth Choir, conducted by H. M. Hughes, Oswestry.

HERR POZNANSKI AND MR. WM. CARTER'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The third and last concert was held in Kensington Gardens Square, at the Blüthner Rooms on December 20th. The programme included a sonata of Haydn for piano and violin and a duet of Rubinstein for the same instruments, in A minor. Mr. Carter played some of the "Lieder ohne Worte." Mr. Poznanski's tour in the provinces seems to have been brilliantly successful. At Oxford a short time ago, when interpreting the violin part of the "Kreutzer" sonata, the first string broke a few bars from the end, when Mr. Poznanski, instead of "leading" in the lower octave, pluckily played the notes (as written) on the second, or A string, which of course he had to "stop" accordingly. The "Rhapsodie Hongroise" of Hanser made a great sensation. The local press of Oxford, Cambridge, Liverpool, Birmingham, Plymouth, Norwich, and Edinburgh are loud in unqualified praise of M. Poznanski. A Huddersfield paper appreciates his avoidance of "gymnastic flights," and the faithful, or strictly objective reproduction of his composers' texts. His bowing is eulogized as smooth and easy, at the same time powerful, and the tone produced is rich and full.

DR. SULLIVAN'S "IOLANTHE."

The first number of a new series of The Theatre, edited by Mr. Clement Scott, contains admirable photographs of Mrs. Beatty-Beere and Mr. Wilson Barrett, and some interesting articles, including an appreciative criticism on "Iolanthe" by Mr. Bentley-Kingston, in which he thus speaks of the music :—"I do not hesitate to say that the music of 'Iolanthe' is Dr. Sullivan's chef-d'œuvre. The quality throughout is more even, and maintained at a higher standard, than in any of his earlier works, each one of which has successively exhibited a marked advance upon its precursor. In fitting notes to words so exactly that the 'book' and its setting appears to be one and indivisible, our gifted countryman is without a rival in Europe, now that Offenbach is no more. His vein of melody seems inexhaustible, and in constructive skill he can hold his own with any contemporary composer. Increase of years has brought him augmented geniality of humour and grace of expression. His musical quips and cranks are every whit as effective as Mr. Gilbert's literary jests; and to be instrumentally funny, without lapsing into vulgarity, is one of the most difficult feats in composition. 'Iolanthe' has manifestly been a labour of love. From beginning to end it does not contain one ugly or even wearisome musical number. The overture epitomises the opera very agreeably, and is orchestrated with remarkable ability. As a work 'Iolanthe' is of greater musical importance than 'Patience.' Its tunes, however, are fewer in number, and perhaps a thought less catching in character than those of 'Bunthorne's Bride'; but in every respect it sustains Dr. Sullivan's reputation as the most spontaneous, fertile and scholarly composer of comic opera this country has ever produced."

On New Year's Day two young and deservedly recognised artists, Miss Julia Gayford and Mr. Packard were married. They are leading members of the Carl Rosa Company.

LEEDS.

The Leeds Choral Society gave a performance of the "Messiah" in Leeds Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 26th, this being the third in the same building within the space of one week, but the fact that it was Boxing Day, and that the price of admission was reduced, brought together a very large audience. Miss Bessie Holt, who was, we believe, new to Leeds, sang the soprano music with great taste and refinement. She possesses a fine voice of excellent quality, and her rendering of the recit. "There were Shepherds" at once produced a favourable impression, which was fully sustained throughout. In the lovely air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," she was also very successful. The contralto music was allotted to Miss A. Clarke, of whom we have had occasion lately to speak in terms of high praise, and her delivery of the recit. "Behold a Virgin," and the air "O Thou that tellest" was marked by true feeling and expression. Mr. R. Sutchliffe, tenor, late of the York Cathedral, was successful in the music that fell to his share. Mr. E. Jackson, bass, Lincoln Cathedral, sang in splendid style, some of his airs being loudly applauded. The careful training of the chorus under their energetic conductor, Dr. Creser, was shown in the admirable manner in which the various choral numbers were rendered, and special mention must be made of the fine choruses, "For unto us," "Lift up your Heads," the sublime "Hallelujah Chorus," and the impressive "Worthy is the Lamb." Mr. Acomb was leader of the band, Mr. A. Benton rendered valuable assistance at the organ, and Dr. Creser conducted in his usual efficient style.

Dr. Spark's organ recitals in the Town Hall are now resumed on Tuesday afternoons and Saturday evenings.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

JAN. 2.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company opened their season at the Court Theatre, on Christmas Day, by a sacred concert, the first part of which comprised Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the second part being miscellaneous. The principal artists in Rossini's work were Mdme. Marie Roze, Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Ludwig, and Mr. Pope. In the second part appeared in addition to the above, Miss Perry, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Turner, Mr. Harley, and Mr. Crotty. Mr. Goosens conducted the "Stabat Mater," and Mr. Pew the second, miscellaneous part. Mr. James J. Monk presided at the harmonium, and the band and chorus were the ordinary opera orchestral players and singers. The only novelty during the week was the production in English of Verdi's "Rigoletto," a very good performance. The other operas given have really nothing new, particularly in the casts, to commend them. Old favourites are greatly missed, and those replacing them are not altogether suitable. The "Bohemian Girl," "Mignon," "La Dame Blanche," "Maritana," "Lucrezia Borgia," and "Fidelio," have filled up the intervening nights. The performances have been well attended, and success has attended each representation. There have been several performances of Handel's "Messiah," but, really, what can one say about these performances? Would it not be an advantage if the "Messiah" could shelved for a time? Why cannot we have a chance of hearing other oratorios not so well known? There are oratorios lying by which it would be for the good and interest of art to bring before the public. Why are not these works produced? There are works by living English musicians well worthy of being performed; works of which no country would be ashamed to own the composers, and yet we never hear of these works being performed. Is there anything wrong with English musical art? Who is to blame? Perhaps the £ s. d. is the arbitrator of these matters! A great deal is talked about English musical art, but very little is done. Is there no Englishman able to write a sacred musical drama, or are we so fettered to German work that English music will not go down? I leave the elucidation of these queries and remarks to abler hands, and candidly hope that some lucid explanations will be given by men capable of grasping the subject, and at the same time fearlessly attack the evil.

WOLVERHAMPTON.

The second of the Wolverhampton Choral Society's fifteenth series of concerts took place at the Agricultural Hall recently, when a performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given. The principal artists engaged were Miss Clara Samuel, soprano; Miss Emilie Lloyd, contralto; Mr. Harper-Kearton, tenor; and Signor Foli, bass; solo trumpet, Mr. F. H. McGrath. The chorus and band numbered 300, under the bâton of Dr. C. S. Heap. The room, was densely packed in every part. The choruses throughout were given with great precision and accuracy, and showed that the choir were well versed in their work. The voices were evenly balanced, and the general effect was excellent. The three choruses most noticeable were "All we like sheep," "Hallelujah," and and the final chorus and fugue, "Worthy is the Lamb, Amen." The band, under the leadership of Mr. Abbott, played with great judgment and skill, and in no part was it unduly prominent. Great praise is due to Dr. C. S. Heap for his tact and skill as conductor.

GLASGOW.

The re-appearance of Herr Joseph Joachim at the third Subscription Concert of the Choral Union, after a prolonged absence, was marked by a most cordial reception. His magnificent performance was intently listened to, and the broad, massive, and technically perfect style of his playing was highly appreciated. He played Beethoven's Concerto in D, Op. 61; Romance from the "Hungarian" Concerto (Joachim); Preludium and Gavotte in E (Bach); and a Capriccio in E (Paganini). The orchestra under Mr. Manns performed a number of works by Cherubini, Schubert, Sullivan, and Mendelssohn, the symphony being Mozart's G minor.

The annual performance of tbe "Messiah" was given on January 1, the principal vocalists being Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. The whole work was rendered with every degree of taste. The next concert will be given on Jan. 4.

The Teatro Regio of Turin opened with Wagner's "Rienzi," the Italian version being by Boïto.

The inauguration of Spohr's monument at Cassel, is announced for April 25th.

Godefroid, the well known harpist, has written a new opera, in five acts, called "The Daughter of Saul."

A comic opera, in three acts, called "Joli Gille" has been written by M. Poise for the Paris Opéra Comique.

The St. Louis U.S. papers say good things of the organ playing of Mr. E. M. Bowman, A.C.O., of that town.

One of the novelties in the way of speculative companies is a "Voice Insurance Company" in Paris.

M. Jules Vieuxtemps, youngest brother of the distinguished violinist, died suddenly the other day in Paris.

A new buffo opera, "La Mille et deuxième Nuit," music by M. Poujade, is to be produced shortly at Rheims.

The Criterion (St. Louis, U. S.) says that the philanthropist Mr. Reuben Spring, has recently given another munificent gift to the College of Music, Cincinnati, an institution already well supported.

Schumann's opera, "Genevieve," was somewhat coldly received on its first production in Rotterdam recently, notwithstanding the undoubted beauties of the score. "Genevieve" is the only opera Schumann ever wrote.

Contrary to general anticipation, there will be no Italian opera at Nice this season. Signor Vianesi, who had organised his company, has renounced the project, and set out for Barcelona.

Some interesting concerts have been given in Florence, which included performances of some of Mozart's and Beethoven's chamber music, and Rubinstein's Sonata in D for violoncello and pianoforte, Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Bazzini's "Saul," and Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

Délibes' "Jean di Nivelles" has not it appears been a great success in Brussels, chiefly through the fault of a heavy libretto. The music is indeed described as graceful and elegant, and at times is effectively orchestrated.

The Italian papers speak well of a new five act opera entitled "Flora Macdonald," which was recently produced in Bologna. The composer, John Urich, a nephew of Karl Vogt, is a native of Trinidad in the West Indies.

The Gazetta Provinciale notes at length the assumption of the office of Chapel Master at the Basilica of S. Maria Maggiore by Ponchielli, who it is believed will maintain "the splendid musical traditions" of that church.

It is stated that Michot, the tenor who created the part of Vasco da Gama in Verdi's "Africaine," in Paris, and sang with success in London, is now reduced to singing at a second-rate café-concert on the Boulevards. Sic transit!

Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony has been given with success at Aix-la-Chapelle, on December 21st. The same work has been also performed by Dr. Damrosch's orchestra at Toronto, creating an impression of a most favourable kind.

The annual Advent service, including the singing of the "Messiah" at St. John's, Ealing Dean, took place on December 20th. The vicar, the Rev. Julius Summerhayes, conducted. Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist. Among the soloists were Miss Jessie Jones and Mr. Forrington.

The long and spirited contest between Mr. Gye and Mr. Abbey to secure the management of the new Opera House, New York, ended, the other day, in the victory of Mr. Abbey, who signed the contract for a year's lease of the house, to be opened on October 22nd with Nilsson, Valleria, Campanini, Del Puente, and other artists not yet secured. The stage of the new house will be the largest in America. Mr. Gye and Mr. Mapleson claim Mdme. Nilsson under her contract to sing with them. Signor Campanini's contract binds him to sing for ten nights per month for seven months, at a thousand dollars a night.

GREAT SINGERS AND GREAT SONGS.

In an article in Musical People, by C. W. Sykes, on "The Golden Age of Song," the writer points out that the great songs have been greatly sung, and will ever continue to be the study of the finest singers. In giving his operatic experience as an American, Mr. Sykes says:—

No singer ever approached Jenny Lind in "I know that my Redeemer!" but she could not compare with Sontag in the Prayer from "Freischütz." Sontag was the best Amina ever heard; but Albani's singing of "Ah non credea" and "Ah non giunge" was infinitely more soulful and brilliant. Sontag's "Roberto, toi qui j'aime" was never approached by any other singer. Parodi could sing "Casta Diva" as well as Jenny Lind, and Lind never could sing Malibran's "Rataplan" as Parodi did, nor "Jerusalem, thou that'stonest the prophets" ("St. Paul"). Three great singers have sung for us, "O luce di quest anima"—Lind, Sontag, and Parepa—but Parepa was greatest in that song. Gerster, Cary, Vietti, Proch, and Albani have sung "It is better to laugh than be sighing," but after Vietti only Albani is to be thought of. It was with her the most unctuous piece of vocalization ever heard in America. The most tremendous effect ever seen on the American opera stage was Grisi's curse of Pallio in "Norma," and next to that, Adelaide Phillips as Azucena in "Trovatore" has perhaps made people's blood run cold more than any other singer. Between Bosio and Nilsson lies the palm for "Lucia." Bosio was the most refined, but Nilsson the most pathetic, perhaps. Kellogg has shone in "L'Etoile du Nord" perhaps with unequalled excellence, and in "Mignon" as Philena has never been surpassed. Of male singers, Salvi, Mario, and Campanini are the three great tenors. Salvi was the superior of Mario in physique, power, and manliness, and could sing "Fra pico a me" ("Lucia"), and "Spirito Gentil" better than Mario, but the latter could occasionally do a delicate thing incomparably, and was unapproachable in tender scenes. Campanini is more like Salvi than like Mario, but not as great a singer as either. Bodiali, Amodio, and Del Puente are the three best baritones we have ever heard here. Carl Formes, Marini, and Lusini were great bassos; Formes having the greatest volume ever known, and Lusini with a grand voice having phenomenal executive facility.

The new arrangement, which is being carried out by Messrs. Gray & Davison, will comprise choir, swell, great, and solo organs. The pipes and old action have been removed from the case in the gallery, and some time must necessarily elapse before the instrument will be ready for use. This welcome advance may be hailed as the result of Mr. Walter Parratt's recent appointment as organist of St. George's Chapel Royal. That gentleman spoke of the new organ scheme at a recent meeting of highly interested members of the College of Organists. A model of the stops, etc., was exhibited upon the same occasion, and a lecture given by Mr. Bosanquet, of Oxford. The rebuilding of the instrument is in good and skilled hands, and the Royal Chapel will at last have a worthy organ.

Mr. William Charles Box, organist of St. John's Church, Worcester, and Associate of the College of Organists, London, has been elected honorary organist to the Worcester Musical Society.

MUSIC IN JAPAN.

The report of Mr. Luther Mason's experiences in Japan as recorded in Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter is of interest, as the following extracts will show. Mr. Mason was for three years director of the imperial conservatory of music at Tokio :—

In Japan, Mr. Mason's work has been most interesting. He has been judicious in his reforms, saying nothing against the Japanese scale and instruments. The Japanese scale has no 4th and 7th, and the 3rd and 6th are sung and played sharp, as if partly to fill up the gap left. There is also a great deal of portamento in both playing and singing. The flutes have large holes, and the player can raise or lower a note by his finger. Thus the whole effect is indecisive. The Japanese have no notion of harmony, except some slight idea of accompanying in 5ths and and 4ths, and as a natural consequence they have no tonality or key. Some of their music is minor, the 2nd and 6th of the minor scale being omitted. As to singing, this is chiefly a kind of recitative used by players, who sing about what they are going to play. There is also another kind, in which men and women join, singing in (absolute) unison.

In this sort of singing the aim of the women is to sing as low as possible, and of the men to sing as high as possible. The way the women are trained is this. An old hag will take a company of young girls out on a damp and cold night. They sit on a bridge, or by a roadside, until they have caught cold. Then, when they are sufficiently hoarse, perhaps next day, the training begins, the younger ones imitating the croak of their preceptress. They sing violently—after the fashion recommended by the Rev. Mr Sandilands—and it is considered a good sign if they spit blood. This process—getting hoarse and singing loudly—is repeated until the necessary depth of voice is attained; the women then can reach C on the second space of the bass clef. The men work in the opposite direction and strain their chest registers up to G and A. The united result is not lovely.

Mr. Mason, when he got to Japan, began in the kindergarten school, attended by the children of noblemen. He introduced "Bonny Doon," "Auld lang syne," There is a happy land," and other pentatonic melodies, which of course the Japanese children readily sang. The 4th and 7th had afterwards to be taught. The 7th gave special trouble, as there was a strong tendency to sing it half a tone flat. When it was sung rightly, then the doh above was often given half a tone too sharp.

The Court musicians had meanwhile watched Mr. Mason's doings and they came to him enquiring for the reason of the difference between their scale and that of Europe. They asked Mr. Mason which was the best scale. He declined to express an opinion, but advised them to get the Professor of Physics at the University (a German) to give them a lecture on the ratios and general structure of the European scale, so that they might draw their own conclusions. The lecture duly came off, and it fully satisfied the Court musicians. Two military bands, under European bandmasters (a Frenchman and a Russian) were already in existence, and a full orchestra was at once established. This is under Mr. Mason's charge, and he has compiled elementary manuals for the violin, viola, 'cello, and double bass for its use. Mr. Mason does not know more than a few words of the language, and works always through interpreters.

Mr. Mason has also compiled an elementary singing manual for the primary schools, but has not encouraged its circulation, because he sees that teachers, not books, are the first requisite in Japan. If this book were circulated it would be misused; its use is to follow, instead of preceding trained teachers. Mr. Mason has concentrated his efforts upon the Normal School for teachers at Tokio, and hopes, in a few years, to send large numbers of qualified teachers to all parts of the land. His method of working shows him to be a true educationist.

"PARSIFAL."

The following words are quoted by Musical Critic from an article on "Parsifal," by Dr. Edward Hanslick of Vienna:—

The Wagner cultus has at present reached, if not already passed, its culminating point. Reason and experience teach us that after such unparalleled inebriation people gradually sober down extremely. Many with us in Bayreuth thought they had already perceived and remarked signs of this, and even warm adherents of Wagner became impatient over the trying game of catching the guiding-motives. Beneath the strongly dazzling charm of novelty, we see more and more plainly the falseness of this one-sided method. The fit of sobriety to which I have referred will probably become downright seediness directly men of small talent shall begin composing in the false operatic style which Wagner's great talent created and alone can wield. At present, the greatest, or at any rate the most sensitive and most grateful part of the public: young persons, women, painters, dilettanteising poetico-musicians and music-poets, belong to Wagner. We, who demand of music that it shall fashion plastically and not merely flow crepuscularly along, and who consider the music of "Don Juan," "Fidelio," and "Der Freischütz," as not alone musically finer, but also more full of life dramatically than the uniformly declamatory music of Wagner, are in the minority. This minority will not, however, die out, but sooner or later, grow up into a majority against the tyranny of the Wagner cultus. If the assertion that posterity alone will estimate him correctly applies to any composer, it applies to Richard Wagner. Not because, like Mozart and Beethoven, not enough, but because too much was made of him during his life.

"Two Loves and a Life" is the title of a story by "Cherubino" in the Christmas number of Figaro, having reference to certain incidents connected with the Parisian life of Chopin and Liszt.

UNIVERSITY LECTURES.

Arrangements have been made for establishing a Centre, in connection with the University Extension Scheme, at Trinity College, London, at which place a course of lectures will be commenced, immediately after the Christmas vacation, on the "Theory of Sound with especial reference to Music."

The College Lecturer on Acoustics, Dr. W. H. Stone, M.A., M.B., F.R.C.P., Balliol, Oxford, has been appointed [the Lecturer, and, at the conclusion of his course of twelve lectures, an examination will be held by an Examiner specially commissioned by the Joint Board of the Universites of Oxford, Cambridge, and London, and Certificates will be awarded to meritorious students, signed on behalf of the Universities' Board. A committee for carrying out the local details has been nominated by Trinity College, the Honorary Secretary being the Rev. R. Gwynne, B.A., to whom all applications for particulars of admission to the course should be addressed, at Trinity College.

The London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, in whose hands the arrangements for the Metropolis have been placed by the Universities, will give all necessary powers to the committee thus formed, and it is hoped that other courses of lectures will be organized for the benefit of musical students in the more popular subjects of study. The lectures will be open to all comers, and the prescribed payment for the course will include the fee for the examination, which is optional.

The University Lectures will in no way clash with or supersede the ordinary curriculum and examinations of the College, which will remain entirely distinct and independent of external control.

The silver medal offered by the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, for the best student in the class for musical acoustics has been awarded, on the recommendation of the lecturer, Dr. W. H. Stone, M.A., M.B., to Joseph Curtis.

On Tuesday evening, December 28th, a very good performance of "The Messiah" was given by the Kew Road Musical Society, Richmond. The solo vocalists were Mdme. Clara West, Mrs. J. LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1883.

MUSIC IN THE NEW YEAR.

THE marked progress music has made of late years will, according to many signs, be continued doubtless in the new year now on the threshold of its career. This progress has been not only a notable feature of our English art-life, but has been an equally characteristic growth in the midst of other advanced nationalities. The chief features of this growing artistic power here, have been naturally manifested in the three directions of composition, executive skill, and advanced educational resources. Our English composers have indeed, one is proud to chronicle the fact, again built up an undeniable reputation for this country as a music-producing nation, and further, mirabile dictu, have succeeded to a great extent in convincing our own people that they possess composers of real merit of their own. Among the tokens of this general advance and increased appreciation are the continued success of sundry English specimens of dramatic music, the actual bestowal of commissions to write English operas on the part of a spirited and far-sighted manager, and the timely, though somewhat timid, advance made by our oldest musical society, in the offer of a prize for an overture. As to the progress of our executants, it is to be noted that our singers and players are multiplying and gaining strength in all directions. But the most significant and marked advance is shown in way of increased educational power, as in the development of such established institutions as the Royal Academy of Music, the College of Organists, Trinity College, and the Guildhall School of Music, to proceed chronologically, and in the energetic efforts, aided by the highest in the land, now being made to establish the Royal College of Music. Nor can the well directed efforts of the Tonic Sol-fa College be unrecorded, or the high and valuable work done by the Musical Association and Musical Artists' Society and the earnest action in the North of the Society of Professional Musicians, be overlooked. Then, again, our strong enthusiastic army of volunteer musicians, who are non-professional in the sense of not being dependent upon their artistic work, have gained ground distinctly in their practical skill, and consequently in their appreciation of good art and conscientious professional artists, and are lending earnest and valuable support to every undertaking which is calculated to advance the best interests of music and its professors. There are signs too of increased activity and growing power in our musical journalism and verbal literature. With such an outlook, with such growing accessions of artistic sunlight and warm enthusiasm, surely the musical prospects of the new year are more than encouraging; they give promise indeed of a full, ripe harvest, well calculated to gladden the hearts of all earnest lovers of music, and to extend far and wide the joys and blessings which ever follow in the footsteps of pure and earnestly cultivated art. E. H. TURPIN.

A TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF HENRY SMART.

THE authorities of Trinity College, London, have taken no step which will meet with more sincere public approval than the foundation of a scholarship, to be called the "Henry Smart Scholarship," in memory of the late distinguished musician, who was a member of the College Council, and an Examiner to the Board up to the date of his death. The scholarship, it is announced, will be open to all comers of either sex under conditions of competition, which the Secretary of the College is ready to furnish to applicants, and will entitle the holder to a three years' course of training on the organ, pianoforte, and in the higher branches of musicianship, preparatory to examination, in view of the complete building up of the successful student's artistic career. HENRY SMART took an earnest and active interest in the work being done by Trinity College, and his attendance and assistance at the meetings, examinations, and composition classes of "Form and Orchestration," were among the last acts of his professional duties, so his memory is held as specially dear to the workers, both teachers and students, of the institution. But higher than such local recollections is the consideration that the memory of a great, honest Englishman, and a true artist of rare powers, has been recognised by the erection of one of the best of monumental structures, a lasting benefit to the art the man honoured thus loved and served so well—a monument which not only helps to keep his memory green, but holds up at the same time his solid work and sturdy artistic honesty by the simple force of his good name, as an example for good, earnest students to follow. There are similar memorials in the Royal Academy of Music; this step is however notable as the first of the kind taken by the authorities of Trinity College, and as the first scholarship bearing the name of our eminent composer. The authorities of our musical institutions cannot do more wisely than multiply scholarships dedicated to the memories of English musical worthies, both as honouring English art and as offering a dignified encouragement for students of mark. ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

I.

THE more or less successful transference of those most eloquent and picturesque of musical idioms we speak of technically as orchestral effects to the less powerfully suggestive mediums of the key-board instruments, forms a subject of much interest, not only as regards the simple transcription of precious thoughts from one medium to another, but as helping to inculcate useful habits of thought as to the creation of eloquent effects upon the key-board instruments themselves. For instance, much of the power found in Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas arises from orchestral habits of thought; they are, indeed, key-board symphonies, and the student of orchestration can find no better practice than would be furnished by scoring these masterpieces for the orchestra, a practice Auber is said to have found much artistic pleasure in practically carrying out. Again, there are many organ effects which are reflections from the orchestra; doubtless students have noticed that the College of Organists' examination papers constantly give aptly selected passages from the stores of classical organ writers, as furnishing happy instances of orchestral effects from the candidate's own key-board as it were. Just as human thought is based in all verbal languages alike upon the same aspirations and motive powers, so in music, the trained thoughts of the musician have their origin in those mental springs which lie beyond all the mediums of expression, though to some extent musical inspirations are necessarily affected by the habits of thought contracted through the different powers of the mediums to which ideas are assigned. So it is important that the student of composition and the producer of the generalised effects peculiar to key-board instruments should gain by contemplation and practical experience a thorough understanding of the parallelisms and approachable points of resemblance, to be noticed and realised, as existing between combinations of single toned instruments and instruments destined to serve the art as producers of generalised and embodied effects.

The fifth annual concert in aid of the Choir-boys' Fund, St. Luke's, Lower Norwood, was successfully given at the Institute, Lower Norwood, on the 29th December. The Christmas carols—always a feature at these concerts—were admirably sung by the choir-boys, and Mdme. Jarratt, Miss Minnie Gwynne, and several members of the congregation afforded great pleasure by their appropriate songs and excellent pianoforte playing. Miss Plowright, a pupil of Dr. Sloman, was very successful in one of Weber's Rondo. The concert-room was well filled, the proceeds amounting to £30. Dr. Sloman organised and conducted the concert.

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM MUSIC OF MENDELSSOHN.

"Midsummer Night's Dream," one of his earliest productions, must be regarded as his most characteristic work. It is a most marvellous result of inspiration and capability of genius and study. It opens at once a new world to our admiring gaze, although we are well accustomed to dream of the original drama and dwell upon its delicious fancies. Shakespeare had led painters and other illustrators of his text to exercise their art in the attempt to realize his imaginings, had occupied critics of the most painstaking kind to unfold the beauties of his creation; but when he inspired Mendelssohn, it became doubly evident that as yet the subject of this dream was not exhausted.

It is really strange that the composer Mendelssohn, who was so devoted a disciple of John Sebastian Bach, and wrote in the contrapuntal style with such great earnestness of purpose, and in true sympathy with the spirit of the old masters, should excel so markedly in fantastic subjects. For counterpoint seems to demand first of all a solid part for the bass and a certain dignity of style that is apparently foreign in nature to this fairy-like music, and to the particular form of scherzo that Mendelssohn inserted. Some of these scherzi are "worked out" in an orderly and thoroughly musician-like style, showing wonderful skill and consistency; and yet, notwithstanding this consistency and regularity, they are extremely excited, feverish, fitful and flurried, and suffused as with a hectic flush.

With reference to a fantastical, airy subject for musical composition, Mendelssohn himself says it is difficult to hit the right medium. If you grasp it too firmly it is apt to become prosaic and formal; and if too delicately, it dissolves and does not become a well-defined form. Facts should not become too dry nor fancies too misty. A comparison of the score of "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture with that of "Queen Mab," by Berlioz, will show how markedly different are the ways in which these two great composers have treated a kindred subject.

It is most remarkable also that musicians (who, one might suppose, would be glad of a subject giving them so good an excuse for revelling at will in fairy-land, indulging in unrestrained fancies) waited for Mendelssohn to open this new region for exploration before venturing into it.

In the second place, it must be allowed that he succeeded well in this his first essay. Thirdly, and stranger still, it must be noted that he accomplished his ends by employing the old forms so exclusively and with such (almost religious) reverence as to give his detractors an excuse for ridiculing him as a pedantic. But by his thorough scholarship he compelled his seniors to acknowledge him as a master, although still very young (which Berlioz could not accomplish); and by this acquired knowledge, which he employed in the development of musical ideas, he gained for his productions a unity of organic structure which greatly raised their immediate value as art-products and yet did not injure their fantastical character. In addition to all this he proved that the old forms had capabilities yet unknown, which was tantamount to inventing new ones.

If Mendelssohn had not acquired the art of adhering to a certain unity of plan his works might have become too incoherent, shapeless, and unsymmetrical to be accounted beautiful as wholes, whatever may have been the charms of various details, or however true the music might be to the nature of the subject. This "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture is as regular in its plan as the most commonplace allegro or first movement of a symphony, being also in the so-called "sonata form." But beyond and above all this, it deserves to be pointed out that although this work may be regarded as "program music," yet it may be most thoroughly enjoyed simply as music, irrespective of all the dramatic intentions of the composer. No doubt thousands of persons hear it and play it in the form of an arrangement for the pianoforte with great gratification, and yet remain in ignorance of the fact that almost every phrase has its strongly-marked characterization. The frolics of the knavish sprite Puck, of Peablossom, Mustard-seed, Cobweb, and of the lightsome throng of their nameless compatriots—as well as the roar of Bottom, etc., etc.—are all idealized herein; yet the music, simply as music, is good. The expressions of Bottom are such original and beautiful phrases that one hardly suspects the composer's intentions.—S. Austen Pearce in the Home Journal, U. S.

PECULIARITIES OF MEYERBEER.

Meyerbeer, it now leaks out, used to bribe the press awfully. A scandalous gossiper on the peculiarities of the maestro, says that "before Meyerbeer brought out a new opera, or revived an old one, which had been some months off the bills, he invited all the leading musical critics to dine with him at the Trois Frères, where he gave them the most sumptuous entertainment the head-cook could imagine. How can a fellow of decent feeling write harshly of a man who has been pouring the choicest vintages of France, and the most delicate tit-bits of sea, air, forest, orchard and garden down one's throat? Try it. You will find the thing impossible. This custom is deplorable, for it militates against the independence and truth of the press. But this was not the worst of Meyerbeer. There were few musical critics in Paris who were not in receipt of annual pensions from Meyerbeer! These pensions of no trifling gratuities, but solid pensions of several hundred dollars, and in one or two instances they exceeded a thousand dollars annually. There were Paris critics who had been in receipt of large pensions from 1831 to 1865. Meyerbeer did not content himself with paying them pensions and good dinners; he also made it a point of duty to give them costly presents on their name-days and on New Year's Day. Meyerbeer used to defend this custom by saying that he did not lay these gentlemen under obligations, he was the person obliged, and he could not see any objection to his giving evidence of his gratitude to them for the substantial service they had rendered him. The habit was unpardonable, and was solely due to what Carl von Weber called the accursed desire of success.

"Meyerbeer could not bear the sight of a musk-melon; he fainted when one came near him. Scribe ordered an artist to decorate his dining-room; the unlucky painter placed a musk-melon among the fruit which adorned the room. Scribe was out of town; upon his return he discovered the melon, and ordered its immediate removal, solely because he never could get Meyerbeer to dine with him if that fruit was visible."—American Art Journal.

PANTOMIME MUSIC.

Art may be "long," but art advances, and notably the art with which this journal is particularly concerned. One instance of progress may be cited, to wit, the case of pantomime music. Forty, aye, even twenty years ago, the so-called "Overture" to the "New Grand Comic Christmas Pantomime" consisted of common barrel-organ tunes strung together like onions on a rope; and one point was the delivery of some popular ditty by the House, as an "episode" in the "overture." The writer remembers to have heard the air, "My lodging is the cold, cold ground" thus treated at Drury Lane Theatre, when Wieland, the famous clown, took part in a pantomime called "Harlequin and Jack Frost." Then, during the harlequinade, the band played, with tedious reiteration, a set of vulgar tunes, such as might be heard at the old fairs in the country. In short, the music of the pantomime was simply an infliction.

Nous avons changé tout cela! To speak only of Drury Lane Theatre, where the new Pantomime is admitted by all to be a triumph of spectacle, the episodical music equally delights the ear, and its association with the kindred art of Terpsichore invests the entertainment with a spirit of elegance. The writer, at a morning performance last Saturday, heard several really pretty tunes, light and effervescent, yet quite free from music-hall vulgarity. Amongst familiar programmes of harmony, the—at ordinary theatres—not very common modulation into the relative minor of the dominant was gladly recognised; also the more hackneyed, but always effective, harmonisation of the mediant note of the scale with the dominant (common chord) of the relative minor. A Mozartean suspension of the cadence on the strong accent of the bar did not escape notice. The old complaint of alternate "tonic and dominant" cannot justly be made against the chef d'orchestre of Old Drury. At other theatres the same gratifying improvement of taste may doubtless be observed.

Of course, when the harlequinade begins, a descent to the bathos is inevitable; but the harlequinade at Drury Lane, poor and stupid enough, only endures for three scenes, where the old jokes of calling policemen, and making artificial slides are ruthlessly repeated. In former days, the harlequinade was usually the salient feature of the pantomime, and lasted at least as long as the introduction. "Transformation" scenes were then unknown in the present grand spectacular sense of the term; the climax of scene-painting was reserved for the end. The harlequin, columbine, clown and pantaloon did not, as now, slip in, ready dressed, from the wings; but at the command of a fairy, doffed the integuments in which they had previously acted as special "characters" of the introduction, and revealed the welcome costumes of the pantomime. "Here we are!" cried clown and pantaloon. Tom Matthews, famous in his day, generally engaged a friend in the gallery to interrupt him with a "gag" word at the end of each stanza in "Hot Codlins," and affected to resent the interruption by crying out: "I'll tell your mother of you," and "One fool's enough at a time." On one occasion, the gallery friend suggested an obvious rhyme—the word "drunk"—to which Matthews retorted, "nothing so vulgar"; thereby exciting roars of laughter. "Hot Codlins" and "Tippetywitchet" have given place to the more elegant strains of the orchestra, and the most inveterate Conservative will hardly protest against the reform. A. M.

WIND PRESSURE.

In one of a series of articles—"On the Organ and In the Organ"—Mr. Hermann Smith contributed to Musical Opinion, the following passage occurs:—

The ordinary organ pressure is three inches, and, referring to the table, you will see that when the gauge records three inches the pressure per square foot is 15lb. 9oz.; therefore, whatever the superficial area of the bellows may be, that will be the ratio per foot; the wood-top of bellows will of course be reckoned in the weight. So also every inch more of water supported tells that there has been 5lb. 3oz. added for each square foot. The reservoir supplying the reed-stops is very commonly weighted to six inches. Notice how largely the amount of the pounds must be made up on the bellows. Then, again, in large organs the wind frequently, for reservoirs supplying certain reed stops, is fixed at nine inches, and we are required to place the enormous amount of 46lb. 12oz. for every square foot of surface. In some organs this even is doubled. Further, notice what for any given pressure must be the initial velocity of the stream entering at the foot of the pipe, and think of all that is implied in a fact having that significance. More astonishing still is the following table, which we owe to Dr. W. H. Stone. Nothing of the kind had been done previously, and this is due to the rarity of the combination of conversance with the higher branches of science, and practical skill and knowlege of wind instruments. I have witnessed Dr. Stone's experiments, and give you his own words describing the method for obtaining the data. "The wind-chest in this case is invariably the human thorax; the experiments were made for the purpose of determining what the pressures within the thorax actually were. A water-gauge was connected with a small curved piece of tube by means of a long flexible india-rubber pipe. The curved tube, being inserted in the angle of the mouth, did not, after a little practice, interfere with the ordinary playing of the instrument. The various notes were then sounded successively, and the height at which the column stood was noted. The following table was obtained as an average of many experiments:—

TABLE OF PRESSURES.

	From lowest notes to highest.
Oboe	9in. to 17in.
Clarinet	15in. to 8in.
Bassoon	12in. to 24in.
Horn	5in. to 27in.
Cornet	10in. to 34in.
Trumpet	12in. to 33in.
Euphonium	3in. to 40in.
Bombardon	3in. to 36in."

Among orchestral instruments, the clarinet displays a remarkable peculiarity. The order of pressure is reversed; the lowest notes demand the greatest pressure, and the highest the least, whilst, as will be seen, all the other instruments begin with low pressure, and need powerful wind to evoke the high notes. And what pressures they are! The organ is weak, indeed, in comparison. Multiply 40in. at 5lb. 3oz. per square foot per inch. The value of such a tabulated record cannot be thoroughly recognized until you place the former table of velocities, weights, and pressures side by side with this, and examine them together: then these figures will acquire a fuller emphasis, and will sufficiently explain the cause of the superior intensity characterising the orchestral wind instruments. If a corresponding record of the power of the human voice could be obtained, no doubt the index would reach a high figure. It has been estimated that an ordinary effort of the voice as in calling, is equal to 8in. pressure.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT GRANT TO CATHEDRALS.

The French Government, which gives the Opéra the handsome annual subsidy of £32,000, has suppressed the grant for £12,000 hitherto allowed the French cathedrals for the organ and choir. M. Charles Gounod has written an eloquent protest against the step, which he describes as a heavy blow to the cause of solid musical education. Cathedral choirs have always, he says, been the nursery of great musicians, and he instances Palestrina in Italy, Orlando di Lasso in France, and Tallis in England to illustrate his statement. Later on Sebastian Bach, "the colossus on whose shoulders all modern music rests, and Handel, the giant of the oratorio in England," had the same training. Of the same school, too, were Marcello and Pergolesi, Porpora, Haydn's master, and, in our own day the Abbé Vogler, who taught Weber and Meyerbeer. Plain chant he considers the noblest introduction to the science of harmony, and he knows no work of any master which can "challenge comparison with the redoubtable majesty of these sublime chants we hear every day in our temples at funeral services, the 'Dies Iræ' and the 'De Profundis.'" The church choir, he says in conclusion, is the only place where music is studied without pernicious striving after effect, "an aim born of vanity, which cannot produce servants of truth. The cause of the cathedral choirs is the cause of musical probity."

All musical people will sympathise with M. Gounod in his appeal, although he is somewhat astray in claiming Bach and Handel as children of the cathedral choir, and might have included Haydn, Mozart, and even, to some extent, Beethoven, in his list, not to add our own Purcell and other great composers. The step taken by the French Republic is simply a move in obedience to public opinion, and may be indicative of an overstrained relationship between the church and certain political sections; it may indicate too an approach to the possible ultimate separation of the church from State patronage and control. The policy thus inaugurated, putting aside other considerations not here to be discussed, will be regretted as likely to check the progress of church music, which, in France, calls for careful nurture from the too persistent employment of plain song, pure and simple. Further, it will throw the support of one of the most valuable of all the artistic classes, the church musician, upon the general resources of the cathedral establishments, or upon extraneous aid. Though it is to be hoped that the French national authorities will yet reconsider their proposals and not leave the inference that the nation is more solicitous about the support of the opera, than anxious to foster church music, it is not necessary to take too gloomy a view of the matter. In truth, the French State-helped opera is by no means a healthy institution and the State subsidy does little more than protect the opera from wholesome criticism and healthy public opinion. The opera, indeed, should stand or fall upon its own merits now, for the State protection has failed to secure even artistic success. Then surely that institution, which is built upon a rock, and will live on regardless of the world and worldly help, cannot and will not fail to support those charged with the duty of maintaining the sacred song of the church. In spite of much that is said to the contrary, the church in France is strong, and holds a high place in the affections of a large portion of the people, and the musical requirements of the time-honoured cathedrals will neither be forgotten or overlooked.

The fifth season of the London Amateur Society has commenced, and the members of the choir have begun the rehearsals of two new works, viz., a "Stabat Mater" by Anton Dvorak, and a "Messe Solenelle de Paques" by Gounod, in addition to Schumann's "Manfred," and other important works. The society has taken up a new position, and appeals to the sympathy of the general public on the ground of the fact that the performances of the society having hitherto been only of a quasi-public character, tended to narrow the influence the society might otherwise have exercised; and it was "obvious that sooner or later these restrictions would have to be brokeu through, and the performances of the society brought more prominently forward." The great difficulty will be to ensure sufficient rehearsals, without which no choral society can succeed.—Sporting and Dramatic News.

ACCENTUATION IN ORGAN PLAYING.

The remark is frequently made that no accent can be given upon the organ, and hence the effect produced must in a large degree be monotonous. Writes Mr. H. Clarence Eddy in the Indicator:—This to a certain extent is true, for, unlike the pianoforte, which responds to the various qualities of touch, and produces a tone in accordance with the power of attack, the organ tone is not intensified by a pressure stronger than that sufficient to hold the keys fully down, and therefore sharp accents are against the very nature of the organ. Nevertheless, it has been observed that under certain conditions, or perhaps more tersely expressed, under certain fingers, the effects have been wonderfully vigorous, crisp and brilliant, even to such an extent that former theories have been exploded in the minds of connoisseurs, as may be seen from the following extract, written by Boston's eminent musical critic, Mr. John S. Dwight, concerning an organ concert given in that city:—"In all his performances we were impressed by two qualities, which we have rarely found possessed in so high a degree by any of our organists. The first was a certain art of phrasing, which in the nature of things would seem to be almost impossible upon the organ; and yet, by some clever management, he did give us the effect of phrasing, even without accent. The other was his perfectly firm and even time in fugue playing," etc. The secret of this "art of phrasing" which surprised the venerable critic, Mr. Dwight, lies mainly in the manner of removing the hands or the fingers from the keys, and here it may be remarked that the method of producing good effects upon the organ is to be found quite as much in the manner of leaving the keys, as in the mode of pressing them down.

Promptness of attack is indispensable, the keys (both pedal and manual) should never be struck with a sharp blow, as is too frequently the case, even in piano playing, but pressed down firmly and quickly, thus imparting ease and grace to the performance. The action of the fingers in leaving the keys should likewise be prompt and quick, thereby insuring well-defined harmonies and a clearness of execution otherwise not attainable.

By means of the legato touch, groups of two or more notes are joined together into phrases, and the proper method of connecting these notes constitutes the art of phrasing.

The playing of that veteran organist August. Haupt, of Berlin, was remarkable for its force, vigour, animation, and brilliancy, although at all times it was perfectly clear and steady. Upon analyzing his performance, it was found that the secret of his power consisted not only in his perfect mastery of phrasing, but in a peculiar emphasis, which he invariably placed upon the first note of each melodic phrase, which, however, was not exaggerated to such an extent that the note seemed to be dotted, or that the phrase was uneven, but by judiciously prolonging the introductory note of each phrase, and the primary part of each measure, the result gave a perfect sense of accentuation, and therefore an unmistakable life and meaning. Haupt possessed this art of phrasing in such a high degree that everything he played was imbued with a peculiar magnetism, and the great preludes and fugues of Johann Sebastian Bach, especially, seemed to possess a new life and individuality under his masterly touch. Throughout all his playing, which was unusually animated and vigorous, there remained always a perfect sense of dignity and repose, the tempo being kept perfectly even and steady. Such a mastery of the enormous difficulties presented required indeed a highly developed technique and extraordinary facility of execution, but without that inborn sense of rhythm, accentuation and phrasing, the playing would be dry and uninteresting; the form might be preserved, but the spirit would be wanting.

Unfortunately, we have too many examples of feverish, unsteady, superficial and meaningless playing, which, to say the least, is inartistic and thoroughly unsatisfactory. The value of playing in time is totally disregarded by the majority of students, and even professional musicians. While this may, perhaps, be regarded as a digression from the subject under consideration, yet it is a vastly important element in a satisfactory performance upon any instrument, and especially upon the organ. The general lack of appreciation for most music of a strict character, such as fugues, toccatas, canons, sonatas and suites is due mainly to the indifferent, lackadaisical, and even slovenly manner in which they are usually ground out. The theme and the counterpoint are all alike to the would-be artist, and quite naturally the audience is suffered to remain in ignorance of their distinguishing characteristics. In all polyphonic music, where one or more themes are developed according to scientific principles, this is especially true, and it is just here that the value of accentuation and phrasing is untold, and to a great extent unknown. The principal themes should be pronounced in a manner to indicate a definite character; they may always be easily recognised whenever they occur throughout the composition. The counterpoint should be smooth and flowing, like the undercurrent of a mighty river, but at the same time, the rhythmical form should be ever felt in its onward course, and this may be secured by dwelling slightly upon the primary part of each measure, or more properly upon the first note of every well-defined phrase. If organists generally would consider these principles and study more carefully the contents of the pieces which they perform, the result would be a far better appreciation of those works by the executant and a more positive sense of enjoyment on the part of his listeners.

Without enlarging unnecessarily upon this subject, it seems desirable to indicate some of the mistaken notions which prevail in regard to the termination of a musical phrase. In the first place, the analysis of a composition is to many players what syntax and prosody are to the average elocutionist—a sealed book, the key to which they are unable to find, and are content with a few marks of punctuation, without investigating the various forms of periods and sentences. It is therefore to be expected that these signs of expression and phrasing will often be applied without intelligence, and the result will be a false interpretation.

The slur, when placed over a group of two or more notes of equal length, is understood to signify that the notes are to be played in a smooth and connected manner. It is also employed as a sign for phrasing whereby not only the first note of each phrase is to receive an accent, but the last note is to be shortened. This rule is sometimes explained as invariable, which is undeniably incorrect. Nearly all examples of groups containing only two notes of equal value are to be played as indicated above, exception to the notes being taken when the notes are too long in slow tempo, in which case the second note is connected closely to the first, and held its full length, the slur signifying merely that the first of the two notes is to receive an accent, likewise when the second note is of greater value than the first. On the contrary, groups containing three or more notes of equal length are, as a rule, to be played in a smooth and connected manner, without detaching one group from another, except in cases of melodic phrasing complete in themselves. The first note of each group, however, should receive a slight accent unless especial marks of emphasis are written. The various other means of expression do not come under the subject of this article, but organ-playing would become more characteristic and potent if the study of touch alone was more earnestly regarded.—Musical Record (Boston).

OUR NATIONAL ANTHEM AS A CANTO FERMO.

As a supplement to the interesting notes on this subject sent to you in May last (Mus. Stand., May 27th), by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, the following extract from the Harmonium, 1824, may perhaps find a place. Describing the "Concerts Spirituels" given at the King's Theatre during Lent of that year, the writer, mentioning the instrumental part of these concerts, goes on to say: "The most successful effort of this fine orchestra was made in the performance of a movement in a new 'National Symphony' by Mr. Clementi, in which he introduces 'God Save the King' in an uncommonly scientific and ingenious manner, and with the happiest result. The same thing, however, had been done by Mr. Attwood, in his anthem performed at the coronation; the merit, therefore, of originating the thought, is due to the latter."

Clementi being so little known as a writer for the orchestra—even so well informed a musician as Herr Pauer stating that he "concentrated his talent as a composer entirely on the pianoforte" ("Beethoven's Earlier Sonatas," Mus. Stand. Dec. 9th, 1882),—I may mention that a symphony of his was performed by the Philharmonic Society, April 21st 1823. The notice in the Quarterly Musical Magazine says: "The symphony of Clementi was a noble composition, conducted with consummate art, wrought with great judgment, and replete with fine and novel effects. It demonstrated that this justly admired veteran is still in possession of the fulness of his powers, and displayed a vigour of imagination and conception more correspondent with a genius in the plenitude of youthful strength, than that of a man who had passed the limit by which human life is ordinarily bounded." (Clementi was then 71 years of age).

The following year, 1824, the Philharmonic Society produced a MS. overture by Clementi, the performance taking place on March 22nd. It is described as a work full of vigour and learning, and containing power and brilliancy of orchestral effect. At the farewell concert given by Ferd. Ries, April 8th, 1824, "Mr. Clementi conducted a new overture, composed by himself, in person." This may have been the one just mentioned.

None of these works have been published, and because they are never heard now it does not follow that they are worthless, and must die. Concert directors should bring forth from the treasures of art "things new and old." It would be most interesting to hear some works by writers of the last century and the beginning of this; for by such means we could better measure progress in orchestral writing, than by listening always to works by those still "head and shoulders" above all successors.

STEPHEN S. STRATTON.

PROF. MACFARREN'S MUSIC TO "AJAX."

The following extracts are from an appreciative description in the Athenæum of the setting as recently given in Cambridge with much success. The music consists of "An orchestral prelude, four unison choruses with instrumental accompaniment, and an interlude introducing the second scene. The work is full of charming melody, and the unison choruses are so tastefully accompanied by the orchestra as never to become monotonous. A serious difficulty which presented itself to the composer has been overcome with consummate skill—we refer to the setting of the original text in place of an English translation. The Greek verses are so different in metre and accent from those of our own language that no small amount of ingenuity is required to adapt to musical forms which shall be acceptable to our ears without at the same time being so modern in spirit as to be at variance with the general feeling of the drama. Little attempt has been made to introduce ancient modes, beyond the occasional use of the scale without the leading note, as in the chorus in E minor. Prof. Macfarren has unquestionably shown sound judgment in speaking to his audience in a musical idiom familiar to their ears rather than endeavouring to reproduce faithfully the art of a past age. What is required in such a case is that the music should produce upon the hearers of to-day an approximation to the mental effect of that which two thousand years ago accompanied the first performance of the drama. The conditions of art have so changed that were it possible to secure and perform the original choruses of the work it is morally certain that the impression produced by them would be at the least unsatisfying. In the chorus of 'Ajax' we find the spirit and feeling required, though the means by which the effect is obtained differ very widely from those employed by the Greeks. Such choruses as the first, and the hymn to Pan which precedes the entry of the messenger, leave nothing to desire, either from the point of view of absolute music or as the appropriate illustration of the dramatic situation. The gem of the whole work is perhaps the final chorus, preceded by a short funeral march, while the body of Ajax is carried off. Following the example of Handel, Prof. Macfarren has written his 'Dead March' in a major key, and the experiment has been completely successful, great effect being obtained by means of the utmost simplicity. There is only one number in the whole of the work which (at least on a first hearing), appears unsatisfactory. The orchestral interlude which occurs at the change of scene has rather too lively a character for its surroundings. Considered simply as music, it is excellent, but in its position here it appears to us out of place. On the whole, the music of 'Ajax' is likely to increase the fame of its composer, though probably the fact of its being written to a Greek text will prevent its being so often heard as it deserves.

A MODERN OPERA PLOT.

ACT I.

A lady (very high soprano)
Is buried in the depths of woe;
The deeper grows her vocal sorrow,
The higher up her head tones go.

Beloved by an awkward tenor,
She clings to him with faithful heart;
Her brother (very heavy basso),
However, tears the pair apart.

The tenor, after singing falsely,
Decamps and goes to parts unknown;
The lady proves that this afflicts her
By flatting almost half a tone.

She tells her troubles to her servant,
A very faithful (alto) maid,
Who listens without much emotion,
As if she felt quite underpaid.

ACT II.

A marriage follows with another,
(A tenor of the second class);
Her brother seals the fatal nuptials,
And things come to a frightful pass.

Her lover had a round-trip ticket
When he went off to parts afar;
He comes back just too late to stop it,
The wedding's done—and here we are.

The lady faints to heavy brasses,
The lover curses with the strings;
A tumult follows in orchestra.
Then all the crowd together sing.

ACT III.

The lady, after long cadenzas,
Plunges a dagger in her breast:
The lover doesn't seem to like it,
And draws a high C from his chest.

The brother stabs the awkward tenor,
Who doesn't know which way to fall,
But finally becomes recumbent,
With an enormous caterwaul.

The brother, lonely and forsaken,
Upon the dead soprano calls;
The chorus, looking apathetic,
Sing on until the curtain falls.

—Music and Drama.

It is related that Rev. Dr. Samuel West, of New Bedford, U.S., once reduced a refractory choir in the following way:—It having been rumoured that they would not sing a note on the next Sabbath, he commenced the morning service by giving out the hymn,

"Come ye that love the Lord."

After reading it through, he looked up very emphatically at the choir, and said, "You will begin at the second verse—

'Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our Lord.'"

Passing Events.

Mr. E. J. Breakspeare read an admirable and thoughtful paper on "Musical Æsthetics," his second on this subject, before the "Musical Association," on January 1st.

Prof. G. A. Macfarren, whose great gifts and untiring industry have done so much for English art, is said to be busily engaged upon his new oratorio, "King David," for the Leeds Festival of October next.

Gounod's oratorio "The Redemption," it is understood, will be rendered, with full orchestra, in Westminster Abbey, some time before Easter, the day being not yet fixed.

At the Christmas service at Dr. Allon's church at Islington, Mr. Robert Kennedy, of the well-known family of Scottish vocalists, gave "Comfort ye my people" and and "Every valley" with much expression.

The Christmas music from the "Messiah" was rendered to the accompaniment of a small but efficient orchestra at a special service by the choir of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, on Sunday last, and was conducted by the Precentor, the Rev. J. Baden Powell.

A soirée of London Tonic Sol-fa-ists and friends, as Falcon Square Lecture Hall (close to the General Post Office) which is to be held on the evening of Monday, the 8th inst., will, it is expected, be attended by a large number of influential supporters of the movement.

The Welcome, a well-conducted illustrated magazine published by Partridge & Co., does not overlook music. In the current number, under the title of "The New Year," a fine old English melody of 1650 is given, as judiciously harmonised by T. Crampton. The general contents of The Welcome are good and well varied.

Under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, a new association has been formed which promises a high artistic usefulness. The works now in preparation are Handel's "Belshazzar," "Utrecht Jubilate," Funeral Anthem, the "Ways of Zion," and "Water Music," together with compositions by Gluck, Brahms, and Raff.

The Musical World says that the original copy of the pianoforte score of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew gave to the Sacred Harmonic Society with a reservation, that if the Society were ever dissolved, the MS. should revert to her, has been returned by the Committee to Mrs. Bartholomew. There are 43 numbers. "O rest in the Lord," was taken from it for presentation to the Guildhall Library, and has been lost or mislaid ever since.

The Musical Review, published by Novello & Co., is not the only new paper of its class issued for the first time at the beginning of the new year; another publishing firm, Messrs. Patey and Willis, have started a paper called The Lyre, to be edited by that learned and experienced writer Mr. J. Bennett. Earnest good wishes for the success of these new instruments for the advancement of the art are offered.

A new field for musical tuition will be gained in the City of London College, the new building of which will open in a few weeks, when music classes under Mr. W. G. McNaught (elementary and choral), and Mr. Geo. Oakey, Mus.Bac. (harmony and counterpoint), will be formed. The new college, which has been built at a cost of £16,000, and will accommodate 4,000 students, will, no doubt, open most prosperously. Violin and pianoforte classes are also to be held.

Speaking of "Colomba,' Mr. Carl Rosa's leading novelty for next season, the musical editor of Figaro, who is ubiquitous and astute enough to be accounted the "Ariel" of musical criticism, says the composer, Mr. McKenzie, has made considerable use of the "leitmotif," and has given great importance to the orchestration, although otherwise the opera, it is said, is debtor but slightly to the teachings of Richard Wagner and his followers.

Miss Alice Roselli held a grand concert at the Music Hall, Chester, on the evening of December 19th. She sang Rossini's "Una voce," Roeckel's "Lord Mayor Whittington," and M. Welling's song "Forget, forgive." Concerted pieces, led by Miss Roselli, equally displayed her brilliant execution and fine style. Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mdme. Patey, and Sig. Villa sang in turn.

The Querist.

REPLY.

THE KALLIFFTHONGON.—This instrument (by a M. Fiebig, and stated to be an improvement upon one of the same kind by Mr. Hawkins), was exhibited in London in 1829, and is thus described:—"The effect it produces is that of a violin quartet, and it is played in the same manner as the pianoforte. A bow is attached to each string, and is drawn to and fro by means of a pedal, which the performer keeps in motion; the keys bringing those strings that are required in contact with the bows. The instrument possesses considerable power, while its tone may be diminished to a pianissimo." The inventor gave performances upon it, and played pieces of his own composition, evincing considerable talent. The upper tones of the instrument were described as harsh, and the touch heavy enough to ruin the finger of any pianist.—S. S. S.

TRIADS: THEIR RELATIONSHIP AND TREATMENT.*

BY FRANCIS EDWARD GLADSTONE, MUS.DOC.

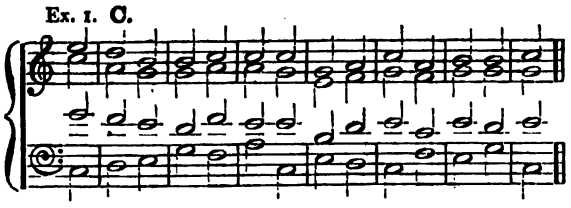
THE subject upon which I have undertaken to speak this evening is one which may well occupy the attention of every student of harmony or counterpoint. The many books which have been written upon modern harmony are chiefly intended to illustrate and to explain the use of discords; while the comparatively few modern treatises on counterpoint generally deal more with the movements of combined parts than with the chords which are the result of those movements. It would, of course, be foolish to assert that the question of the relationship of triads has never been fully discussed. Those of you who have read the admirable and profoundly learned work by Professor Helmholtz on the "Sensations of Tone" would at once contradict such a statement. But, inasmuch as the average student of harmony or counterpoint gains from his books little beyond a knowledge of the generally-accepted rules of the musical art, and since an appeal to our sense of hearing is insufficient of itself to explain these rules (although it will certainly corroborate them), I trust that the remarks which I have to offer may not be thought altogether useless, although they will cover but a small portion of the wide field for research which lies before us.

The basis of music is the diatonic scale. The derivation of the scale will be considered later. For the present I will ask you to let the scale of C major be assumed, and to call to mind the triads which may be built upon its several notes. Purposely omitting the triad upon the seventh of the scale, because of its imperfect fifth, I will play to you a series of chords formed from the other six triads, adding a cadence to complete the phrase. Next, I will play the same chords in exactly reversed order; and then you shall hear a few bars in which, without transgressing the well-known law against consecutive fifths and octaves, I have nevertheless intermingled the same six chords in such a way as to produce a very ugly result:—

Ex. 1. A.

Ex. 1. B.

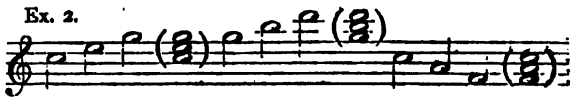
Ex. 1. C.



Having heard these three examples, you will probably agree with me that the first is good, the second is awkward, and the third is worse than awkward. It would be premature if I were at once to analyze any of the progressions which you have just heard. My object in drawing your attention to them now is merely to point out the direction which our enquiries are to take. We have, in short, to endeavour to ascertain—(1) what progressions from one triad to another are agreeable to the ear, and (2) why they are so.

Our modern major scale is formed from three triads thus: Taking C as the starting point, add to it a major 3rd (E) and perfect 5th (G); next, take the G thus found as the basis of a second triad, G, B, D; lastly, take C as the highest note of another, F, A, C:—

Ex. 2.



Now, if these intervals are, tuned accurately, i.e., if G and F are perfect 5ths respectively above and below C, if D is a perfect 5th above G, and if the 3rds are true major 3rds above F, C, and G, we obtain seven sounds, which, arranged scale-wise (with the octave to C added), stand at the following distances from one another: D is a major tone above C, E is a minor tone above D, F is a major semitone above E, G is a major tone above F, A is a minor tone above G, B is a major tone above A, and C is a major semitone above B:—

Ex. 3.

But there may be some among you who are more familiar with the scale of equal temperament, now generally adopted for the tuning of organs as well as pianofortes, than with the theoretically-accurate scale formed in the manner which I have described. For the sake of clearness and completeness, therefore, I will remind you that, whereas our pianoforte key-board gives us (or, at all events, professes to give us) equal tones and equal semitones throughout its compass, the true diatonic major scale has two distinct intervals in addition to the semitone. It is very important to our present purpose that we should clearly recognize this fact, because, although we are accustomed to intervals slightly out of tune, there can be little doubt that in progressions from note to note, or from chord to chord, our ears accept the notes for what they should be rather than for what they are. I hope to illustrate this presently. In the meanwhile I will return to our scale of C major, and ask you to examine its various intervals with a view to testing the accuracy of my list. We all know that a perfect fourth is obtained by inverting the notes forming the interval of a perfect 5th, and mathematicians have given the name "major tone" to that interval by which a 5th overlaps a 4th. Thus, from C to G, in the true scale of C, is a perfect 5th, and from G to D downwards is a perfect 4th—therefore the interval from C to D is a major tone; similarly, it may be shown that the interval from F to G is a major tone. But A and B are at the distance of a major 3rd from F and G respectively, therefore A and B must also be separated by the interval of a major tone. The term "minor tone" has been applied to the interval by which a major 3rd exceeds a major tone. Thus, the interval from C to E being a major 3rd, and that from C to D a major tone, the distance from D to E will be a minor tone; similarly, it may be shown that the distance from G to A is a minor tone. I will ask you further to notice that the interval of a true minor 3rd exceeds that of a major tone by the shortest interval found in our diatonic scale, viz., a major semitone; this last interval is also the difference between a perfect 4th and major 3rd. Now, if we proceed to analyze the scale itself, we shall find that we must at once dismiss the loose teaching of our childhood, viz., that the modern major scale is formed of two equal portions separated by the distance of a tone. For, whereas, in ascending the lower half, the major tone comes first, in ascending the upper half, the minor tone precedes the major. The true divisions of the scale are, I believe, the following:—

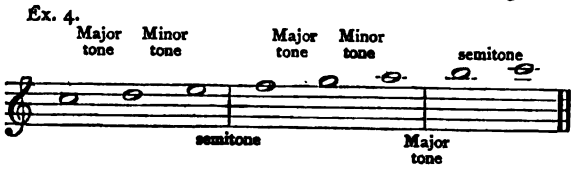
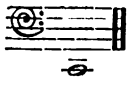
Ex. 4.



The first three notes form one section, the next three form another section exactly corresponding to the first, and the 7th and 8th form an independent section completing the scale, independent, that is to say, of the section immediately preceding it, although, as I hope to show, closely connected in reality with the first group of three notes. This method of dividing the scale was adopted by Logier in his "System of Music," and it appears to me to be justified by the discoveries of scientific men in regard to the phenomena of acoustics. These discoveries teach us that nearly all musical sounds are of a compound nature, and that a stretched string (such as that of a pianoforte or violin) when properly set in motion, not only vibrates throughout its whole length, but also divides and subdivides itself, producing higher and higher sounds, known as harmonics, overtones, or upper partial tones. It will be convenient to employ one only of these terms. I will therefore speak of the first, second, third, &c., harmonic, counting the prime tone or generator as number one. This may not be scientifically accurate, but it is sufficiently so for our purpose. These harmonics rise in regular arithmetical proportions, and by ever-decreasing intervals, but there is a continual recurrence of the original sound in higher and higher octaves. Let me put this in another way. The 2nd harmonic is an octave above the 1st; the 4th harmonic is an octave above the 2nd, with one sound intervening; the 8th harmonic is an octave above the 4th, with three sounds intervening; the 16th harmonic is an octave above the 8th, with seven sounds intervening, and so on. Thus, if we rise from a note to its octave, either at once, or touching on our way in regular succession the various sounds occurring in any one of the higher octaves of the harmonic series, we are but copying what nature does, and the effect consequently is satisfactory. Now, although our major scale does not contain all, or nearly all, the harmonics of any one sound, it is a significant fact that all its notes but two may be derived from one generator. To illustrate this I will direct your attention to the 4th octave of the harmonic series rising from C below the bass staff



I have written the sounds belonging to our scale as minims, and those which are foreign to it as crotchets:—

Ex. 5.

The numbers refer to the places of the notes in the harmonic series, and they also show the proportionate speed of their vibrations. Mathematicians have proved that when two sounds stand at the distance of a major tone apart, the ratio of their vibrations is as 8 to 9; that is to say, if the lower one makes 8 vibrations in a given time, the higher one will make 9. But they have also proved the very important fact that the number of any sound in the harmonic series determines the speed of its vibrations in relation to every other sound derived from the same prime tone or generator. Thus the 9th harmonic stands at the interval of a major tone above the 8th, and consequently the first two notes in the 4th octave above correspond exactly with the first two notes of our scale of C major; similarly, it is proved that the distance between the 9th and 10th harmonics is identical with the interval of a minor tone, that the 8th and 12th harmonics are a perfect fifth apart, and that the 12th and 15th are separated by the interval of a major third. So far, then, our scale agrees with what may be called the scale of nature. The 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, 7th, and 8th degrees are all copied exactly from the 8th, 9th, 10th, 12th, 15th, and 16th harmonics. But if we attempt to ascend our scale of C major, the imitation of the natural scale ceases at the 4th note: our F is flatter than the 11th harmonic. You will remember that, in order to obtain the 4th and 6th degrees of our scale, we took C as the 5th (not the root) of a triad, and C stands towards F in the same relationship that G does towards C; in other words, G is the 3rd harmonic in the series starting from C, and C is the 3rd harmonic in the series starting from F. If, therefore, we continue our ascent of the major scale of C, we shall, on arriving at F, change from one series of harmonics, having for its starting point, to another whose generator is Now, the next note (G) belongs equally to the series of sounds beginning on C, and to that beginning on F: in one case it is the 12th, in the other it is the 9th, harmonic. But the sixth note of our scale can only be derived from F, and we have thus three sounds in succession, F, G, A, which bear the same relationship to hat our first three notes, C, D, E, bore to Proceeding upwards, we re-enter the harmonic series of C. The seventh and eighth degrees of our scale agree exactly with the 15th and 16th harmonics arising from the prime tone

But the step by which we ascend is the wide interval of a major tone, and thus the return from the harmonic series of F to that of C is more abrupt than was the departure. In the latter case we not only copied nature in ascending by a smaller interval than the preceding one, but that interval (i.e., from E to F), although not the next in order, corresponded with the 15th and 16th harmonics arising from F, and so the step was an easy one. In passing from A to B, however, we take a wider instead of a narrower step than the preceding one (viz., that from G to A), and thus the new note B has no direct connection with the preceding note A. It is this fact, no doubt, which gives to the 7th of the sale that peculiar upward tendency which is recognized by modern composers. Having commenced the scale by three notes derived from C and followed these by three notes derived from F, we make a sudden leap into the original harmonic series; but the note to which this leap is made is inconclusive by itself, and so our craving for a re-establishment of the first totality carries us up to C.

I will now play to you Example 4, making a slight pause at the end of each section, when, even with our tempered scale, I believe that your sense of hearing will support my views.

If, however, we proceed to add chords to the scale, the relationship, or otherwise, between note and note is still more evident.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

These Concerts, after a brief interval of vacation, were resumed on Monday evening.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti.

Pianoforte solos—
Polonaise in F sharp minor, Op. 44 } ..... Chopin.
Three Studies, Op. 25, Nos. 6, 8, 9, }
Herr Pachmann.

PART II.

Sonata in A major, for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... Boccherini.
Signor Piatti.

Sonata in G major, Op. 30, No. 3, for pianoforte and violin ..... Beethoven.
Herr Pachmann and Mdme. Norman-Néruda.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

The quartet of Spohr, in three movements, re-introduced Madame Norman-Néruda to the subscribers; and her fine performance excited a sensation throughout the séance. Among salient features should be specially noted the delivery of the second theme (E major), of the first movement; the full tone of the 4th string in the same part of the larghetto (where the key changes from F to C), and the spirited delivery of the sparkling rondo finale, the only movement in simple common time. Signor Piatti, who admirably supported the three upper strings in the quartet, enjoyed his own particular triumphal entry at the beginning of the second part. The annotator, or the printer, has made a blunder in the date of the first production of this Sonata ("the fourth season, Feb. 1882.")

Herr Pachmann made his last appearance. With the exception of the Polonaise, he played the same "Studies" as on Dec. 18, and "by desire"—no wonder. A repetition of previous eulogies is therefore unnecessary; the audience, if that were possible, applauded more enthusiastically than on the first occasion, and the young pianist, on a "recall" played Chopin's familiar Nocturne in D flat. The Polonaise in F sharp minor is an elaborate affair, as it comprises a mazurka movement in A major, and thus agreeably varies the piece with a change of rhythmical accent. The "tributaries" to this Mazurka strike the ear as exquisitely tuneful; and the modulations, chromatic and enharmonic, impart much variety of colour. Herr Pachmann's finesse of style, and nicety of nuances, not to speak of his tours de force and effective climax at the close, must be imagined by unfortunate absentees, for pen and ink are inadequate to tell the tale. The "Studies" are really what they profess to be, and enormously difficult. No. 6 has double notes in thirds, for the right hand, with double sharps into the bargain. In No. 8, there are also double notes for the right hand, but here in sixths; whilst in the bass, a similar doubling occurs above the "fundamentals," a few fifths alternating with the sixth. In No. 9, the melodious Study in G flat, the wrist is severely exercised by groups of four notes, two to be played legato and two staccato; the double notes for right hand consist of thirds, octaves, fourths, and a second.

Madame Menter will play this afternoon, and again on Monday.

The complaints of your "Saturday Afternoon" contributor are only too well founded. On Monday a solemn pause ensued before the second movement of Spohr's quartet could be begun, a long file of "late entries" quite blocked the way; even before this, those who sat in the recesses were grievously annoyed by passers-by, sometimes moving on, but often halting in front! A. M.

DERBY.

Recently Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given by the Choral Union, under the painstaking conductorship of Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell, Mus.Bac. Miss M. Davies, Mdme. Patey, Mrs. Gardener, Mr. Dunkerton and Mr. F. King, were the chief singers. The orchestra and chorus were well up to their work, some of the choruses being highly effective. The orchestra included Messrs. Lazarus, Twinn, Avison, etc. Mr. Cox was the organist.

DENBIGH.

The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise at the Town Hall on Friday Jan. 5th, 1883. The vocalists engaged were Miss Kate Hardy, R.A.M., and Mr. Levison Wyatt (Chester Cathedral) Mr. Stephenson led the orchestra. Master Myrick Robert presided at the piano and Major Casson at the harmonium, and Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted. During the interval the Mayor of Denbigh presented to the conductor, Mr. Felix C. Watkins, a gold mounted ivory bâton and an illuminated address subscribed for by the members of the National Eisteddfod Choir 1882.

MDME. MENTER.

At Mr. Boosey's first "Ballad" concert, last Saturday afternoon, a number of popular airs and some part-songs were well rendered by various artists, inclusive of Miss M. Davies, Miss A. Larkcom, Miss Damian, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, &c. The chief attraction to connoisseurs was the first appearance this season of Mdme. Sophie Menter, whose splendid performances last year, when she held several "recitals," were highly eulogised at the time in these columns.

On Saturday, this gifted pupil of the Abbé Liszt played only a few fugitive pieces, all, however, of sterling merit.

A favourite Etude of Chopin in the mazurka form excited an outburst of enthusiastic applause hardly to be expected at a miscellaneous "Ballad" concert, where vocal music usually bears the palm. In her next piece, the so-called Spinnlied in C, from Book VI. of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," the reading was thought to be rather too restless for the style, which obviously requires a smooth and even exposition of the text. In "Les Patineurs" of Liszt, a clever though rhapsodical "Transcription" of the beautiful ballet scene in "La Prophète" of Meyerbeer, Mdme. Menter found herself absolutely in her own element, and achieved a glorious success. The delivery of the graphic glissando passages, were not only delicious, but quite appropriate to the "situation," commanding the admiration of all, the uninitiated as well as the knowing ones. The delicate and playful humouring of this long asquisse could not be clearly described. Mdme. Menter's ineffable charm of style, fine touch, and intellectual intuition, have before been noticed; an alleged wanting of "sensibility," as already hinted, must be looked for in the auditors who may be unable, from some "twist" in "the things they call their minds"—as Lord Westbury would have said—to appreciate excellence so general, so remarkable. Mdme. Menter was re-called with honour. She is engaged to play "Le Carnaval" of Schumann to-day (Saturday) at the Popular Concert, and again on Monday night, when Chopin's "Polonaise" in A flat and Schumann's pianoforte Quartet in E flat are on the list of numbers. It is a privilege to hear two such pianists as Mdme. Menter and Herr Pachmann within the space of a short month. Mr. Arthur Chappell ought to be warmly thanked for the opportunity thus afforded. Mr. Chappell, as an "opportunist," approaches the late lamented Gambetta.

LEEDS.

The Leeds Parish Church Choir gave their annual concert in the Church Institute on Thursday evening, Dec. 4. The first part of the programme consisted of Sterndale Bennett's cantata, "the Woman of Samaria," which was gone through in a highly creditable manner. The soloists were Masters Parkinson and Hardaker, sopranos; Master Bramham, contralto; Mr. Verney Binns, tenor; and Mr. W. Morton, bass. The performance throughout was excellent, but special mention must be made of the lovely unaccompanied quartet "God is a Spirit," which was rendered in a most impressive manner. The second part of the programme included the opening chorus "Come from the woods," from Dr. Creser's new work "Eudora," which was sung in capital style, and the whole concluded with the chorus from "Tannhäuser," "Hail, bright abode." Dr. Creser played the pianoforte accompaniments.

EDINBURGH.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Jan. 9, 1883.

While the Choral Union deserve the thanks of all musicians for their bold attempt to give a first-class popular concert in the Waverley Market on December 30th, it was to be deplored greatly that, owing chiefly to the unsuitability of the hall, the performance could not be said to have been successful. It really seems "hard lines" that the masses in our city cannot possibly ever have a chance of properly hearing good music well performed. Nevertheless, the trial was in the right direction, and if it in any way furthers the chance, through making evident our present want, that of obtaining some time or other a new hall of proper dimensions for orchestral concerts; then our thanks will be doubly due to the committee of the Choral Union for the concert on the 30th.

"Familiarity," it is well known, "breeds contempt," which wise old saw found ample support from the performance of the "Messiah" on Tuesday, 2nd January. Who was to blame it is difficult to say, but let it be who it may, many of the choruses were most carelessly sung, so much so that, once or twice, had it not been for the orchestra and Mr. Hartley at the organ it would be difficult to say what might have happened. The organ, by the way, was in a worse condition than usual, and evidently handicapped Mr. Hartley to some extent. Every cloud, though, has a silver lining, Mdme. Patey on this occasion being the brighter side of the picture. Her performance—like that of how few, alas!—was quite above criticism and must ever remain with her hearers as a most pleasant recollection. Miss Carlotta Elliott was successful in several of the soprano airs, and Mr. Harper Kearton, if he had infused a little more life into his singing, would have made a feature of the tenor music, but by what accident Mr. Roberts was selected to take the bass part it is difficult to imagine.

The fifth orchestral concert was given on Wednesday, 3rd January, when the chief items of interest were Spohr's Symphony No. 4, "the consecration of sound," overture and garden scene from "The Veiled Prophet," by C. Villiers Stanford, and overture "Les Francs Juges," by Berlioz. M. Victor Buziau on this occasion showed his large musicianly skill as a violinist, and Miss Carlotta Elliot sang several numbers with great acceptance.

Of minor concerts it is impossible to even mention all; one or two, however, deserve passing notice.

Mr. Magnus Peterson gave a most ambitious programme lately at the Queen Street Hall. Indeed, although Mr. Peterson's purpose of popularizing the music of the future is to be admired, it is questionable policy to do so through the medium of an amateur choir. The singing, on this occasion, of Miss Middleton, who bids fair to be, ere long, one of our best local sopranos, was a most enjoyable feature, her taste in executing even the most difficult passages being characterised by great breadth of treatment.

The St. Giles Choral Society, which is a promising body of singers, gave a pleasant Christmas recital, consisting of selections from the "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Fest Gesang." Miss Mackenzie sung the soprano soli with a sympathetic feeling and musical ability which called for all praise. Mr. J. O. Sinclair conducted and Mr. John Hartley at the "vocalion" accompanied.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Mr. Max Bruch has resigned the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society, and will vacate the appointment at the end of the present season, in April. He has accepted the position of conductor of the concerts in Breslau, the capital of Silesia, and the largest provincial town in Germany. In addressing the committee of the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Max Bruch wrote:—"I intend and hope to visit England frequently in the future, and I trust it may be my good fortune to keep up those friendly relations with the Liverpool Philharmonic Society which I value so highly." A strong wish is expressed that Mr. Fred. Cowen will be appointed to the post.

The Carl Rosa Opera season is running along successfully at the Royal Court Theatre. On Monday evening, Donizetti's "La Favorita" was produced for the first time in English, and with a success that reflects additional lustre upon the enterprise of the impresario and the members of the company. The cast was as follows:—

Leonora	Mdme. Marie Roze.
Alfonso	Mr. Ludwig.
Baldassare	Mr. Henry Pope.
Don Gaspare	Mr. Esmond.
Ines	Miss Clara Perry.
Fernando	Mr. Barton McGuckin.

In the character of Leonora, Mdme. Roze had a part in which she appeared to greater advantage than in anything she has so far undertaken in English opera. The music suits her voice, and she fully enters into the spirit of the character. Her rendering of the Cavatina, "Dearest Fernando," was full of intense expression and feeling, and, withal, a thoroughly artistic performance. Mr. Barton McGuckin as Fernando eclipsed his former efforts in other parts. Donizetti's hero is completely suited to Mr. McGuckin's capacities, and with the improvement he has made (both vocally and as an actor) lately, it was a pleasure to be assisting at a creation in which he appeared to such pre-eminent advantage. Of Mr. Ludwig one can only say that in the part of the king he has added another to the long list of triumphs, of which he has reason to be proud. The smaller parts were creditably filled; the dresses were superb, the staging excellent; the orchestration, notwithstanding a few slips, was enjoyable, and the whole performance, under the conductorship of Mr. Goosens, was heartily enjoyed and warmly applauded by the large audience assembled. There were calls before the curtain after each act.

The Philharmonic Society gave their seventh concert of the present season last evening, the principal artists being Mdme. Norman-Néruda and Mdme. Patey. The programme included Viotti's Violin Concerto in A minor; Villiers Standford's Orchestra Serenade, composed from the last Birmingham Festival; and the overtures "Iphigenie en Aulide" (Gluck); "William Tell" (Rossini); "L'Etoile du Nord" (Meyerbeer). Amongst the vocal items was Gounod's song, "The golden thread," also produced at the festival above mentioned, and sung by Mdme. Patey. Mr. Max Bruch conducted, and Mr. Branscombe acted as accompanist.

At Mr. Halle's Orchestral Concert, on Tuesday next, the same two artists who were the attraction at the Philharmonic Concert last evening, are to appear, together with Signor Piatti.

The Karl Meyder Orchestral Concerts have come to an abrupt ending. They did not pay. The following was the programme of the Fortnightly Tuesday Afternoon Concert, given by the pupils of the School for the Blind, yesterday, under the direction of Mr. W. D. Hall:—

Anthem, "Behold I bring you"	Goss.
Recit., "When Jesus our Lord" / Trio, "Say, where is He born" / Chorus, "There shall a Star from Jacob"	Mendelssohn.
Anthem, "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem"	Hopkins.
Chorus, "Hallelujah"	Handel.
Song, "Bethlehem"	Gounod.
Part-song, "Who shall win my lady fair"	Pearsall.
Song, "Rage, thou angry storm"	Benedict.
Duet, "Why listen to the carols"	Mendelssohn.
Song, "Entreat me not to leave thee"	Gounod.
Part-song, "Good night, good night, beloved"	Pinsuti.

It is announced that the committee of the International Exhibition to be held next year in Amsterdam have decided for financial reasons to do nothing in connection with music beyond the performance of a cantata to be composed for the opening ceremony by Herr Verhulst.

Liszt, it seems, has, as a matter of self-protection, addressed an appeal to the German musical papers, deprecating the habit common amongst young aspiring composers, of sending him their scores for inspection. "All contributions to collections of autographs," Liszt adds, "I have modestly declined for many years."

M. Eugène D'Albert, son of Mr. Charles D'Albert, has recently played with great éclat at Berlin and at Weimar, before the Emperor of Germany. His success at the Popular Concerts, two years ago, is a matter of history. This promising pianist is now thoroughly "accepted" in æsthetical Germany, and his studies in that country will tend to increase his reputation.

A prize has been offered at Palermo for the best original composition for the pianoforte.

Signor Disconzi is announced as engaged upon the composition of an opera-ballo "La Cortigiana."

A new opera, the "Wilde Jager" by Nessler, has had a triumphant production at Strasburg.

A kind of secular oratorio, "Alrico," has been performed at Darmstadt. The work is by Herr Vierling.

Joseph Wieniawski is now settled in Brussels, where he is highly esteemed as a teacher.

Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis" is being rehearsed at the Vienna Court Opera House. His "Tribut de Zamora" will be performed for the first time in Vienna on the 20th inst.

The French Quartet Society gave an interesting concert in Paris the other week. The programme included a quartet by Lalo, a trio by Boisdeffre, and a quintet of Félicien David.

Herr August Klughardt's new symphony, lately produced in Dresden, has been very favourably criticised by the German press. A 'Swedish Rhapsody," by Herr Hallén, was performed recently in Berlin, under the direction of Herr Bilse, and well received.

The "Association Artistique" of Angers recently gave a festival in honour of Litolff, who conducted several of his own compositions. Two of these, "Les Chant des Guelfes" and an overture, "Les Girondins," were received with marked favour.

The nature of Hans von Bülow's illness is now stated to be not so dangerous as was believed at first. He is said to be suffering from a nervous complaint, which although serious enough has not in any way affected the brain. In order to pursue the course of treatment thought necessary by his physicians, the celebrated pianist has retired to a hydropathic establishment.

The climate of Verviers, the native town of Vieuxtemps, seems to be favourable to the production of violinists. The son of M. Nicolas Herman, a professor of music in Verviers, was a successful one of 53 candidates who competed for 19 vacancies in the Liege Conservatoire lately. The young violinist is only six years of age.

The following is a list from La Gazzetta Musicale of the new operas produced in Italian in 1882: "Mitridate" (serious opera), by E. Serrano, first performed at Madrid, Jan. 14th; "Ivan" (buffo), A. Lucidi, Bologna, Feb. 6th; "Bianca da Cervia" (serious), A. Smareglia, Milan, Feb. 7th; "Il Progettista" (farcical), A. Scontrino, Rome, Feb. 8th; "Il Conte Chatillon" (serious), N. THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following letter from Prof. G. A. Macfarren, will be read with interest :—

MY DEAR MR. WRIGLEY,—You have expressed so much interest in the subject of a letter I addressed to you last March, that I will trouble you with an amplification of what I then advanced, in case you may think it desirable, and find opportunity, to give publicity to the same.

It has of late been openly stated, in most of the chief towns of England, that the Royal Academy of Music has, during recent years, given no signs of increasing activity, or of power to extend its operations in the furtherance of musical culture. You, your colleagues in the office of Local Examiner, and I, are, I believe, more desirous for the cultivation of music than for the aggrandisement of an Institution we all hold in great regard; but I hope to show reasons why the one will be the best means of promoting the other, and to do so, firstly, by refuting the allegation already cited.

In 1875, Sight Singing Classes were established in the Academy, through which every pupil is required to pass; this was a revival truly, but of a matter which had been so long in disuse that the revival had the air of a novelty. In the same year the Public Choral and Orchestral Concerts by the pupils, which previously had never been given in an arena larger than the Hanover Square Rooms, were transferred to St. James's Hall, where they are now attended by audiences of from 1500 to 2000 in number, and are thus the means of affording experience of performing in public to the executants, and of making the public acquainted with the working of the Institution. In 1876, because the growing number of the pupils could no longer be accommodated in the space occupied by the Academy, the new Concert-room was built at the cost of from 4000*l.* to 5000*l.*, wherein the Weekly Choral and Orchestral practices are held, as are also the Yearly Examinations and the Monthly Concerts of Chamber Music. In this year were instituted fortnightly meetings of professors and pupils, whereat the less advanced learners make first essay of their powers between the maturer performances of their elders. A Quartet Class for the Practice of Concerted Instrumental Music was likewise established in 1876, and the Operatic Class was then first opened for the study of the Lyrical Drama, and this Class gives performances, at least once in every term, that have included the whole or portions of operas by the best masters, and occasional productions of the pupils. The formation of Classes for Modern Languages, the appointment of a Professor of Acoustics, and the occasional delivery of Lectures on this and other subjects connected with Music, are all incidental to the period in question.

The foregoing may perhaps be accepted as proofs of the internal activity of the Academy. As an influence on the musical culture of the nation, separately from its own teaching, the institution has sought to be useful by means of the Local Examinations of students held at every important centre, wherein the ability of teachers is tested through the practical evidence of their pupils. The scheme has been two years in operation, and though its details may, and doubtless will, be improved, its efficacy thus far is widely acknowledged. Yet graver in its possible results is the Metropolitan Examination of artists and teachers, which is designed to apply to all branches of practical musicianship such inspection as the universities make of theoretical attainments, and the diploma granted to every successful candidate is a testimony of ability that may in time receive such respect as is paid to a university degree. These two may perhaps be admitted as proof that the exertions of the Academy are not confined within its schoolroom, and that its managing body is not dormant.

Secondly, I wish to show that the cultivation of music in England may better be promoted by the institution of which I speak than it can be by any other. It may be because the academy has had sixty years of experience, during which errors of management have been committed, perceived, and amended, or are in present process of correction; errors to which every new establishment is liable. The academy may be the best means of promoting musical culture, because it has won acknowledgment of its work from Europe and North America, which should and does prompt confidence in its future. It may be the best means, because the long roll of names of eminent musicians that have been nurslings of the academy is an incentive to students in the school to emulate the distinction of their predecessors. The academy may be the best means, because those of its former scholars who, like yourself, my dear Sir, have received the title of member or associate are jealous of the honour of the kind mother under whose wings their own talent was fostered, and therefore do all they can to advance the interests and secure the permanence of their early home.

Many well-wishers of the Royal Academy are inconsiderate enough to say that there is room in England for two great musical seminaries; inconsiderate, I must believe, because the opinion seems not to have been duly balanced. The supposition might have ground were the operations of the academy circumscribed either by the terms of its royal charter or by the policy of its managing body. On the contrary, however, the charter is so elastic in its nature that it allows of the expansion of the academy's doings in any and every direction that may advance the art of music. The committee are anxious to avail themselves of this elasticity in every possible manner, and they have officially signified such wish to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and previously to the Lords of the Privy Council. One establishment holding the confidence of the musical profession is likelier to labour with good effect than two which would contend for public support, and might spend those energies in factious opposition which should be concentrated on internal duties. It was once said that there was room in the ocean for two North Americas, and much noble blood was gloriously shed in support of the hypothesis; but the world seems now to be convinced that the Federal Union is for the true welfare of the Continent.

Everything that is wanted, everything that is possible for musical culture is within the scope of the academy, which needs but fiscal resources to accomplish its purposes. The plan I offered in March to your notice waits but for such means to be fulfilled—the plan, namely, of opening branch schools in principal centres under academy auspices. The Royal Academy of Music does not reject the offerings of those lovers of art who trust in its power for good, and prove their trust by financial testimony. You are one of these, and were your example followed of setting aside a sum towards the establishment of a branch School in Manchester, I cannot doubt that one would speedily be organised wherein the teaching powers of the local professors would be valuably utilised, and the budding musicianship of the neighbourhood would be worthily trained.

The centralising tendency which draws artists of every denomination to the metropolis is not yet so universal as to drain the great provincial centres of all the truly admirable ability of their residents. This ability ought to be appropriated to its great moral and intellectual purposes of education in the several localities where it remains, and the wish of the Academy management is that such powers should be made of avail until that period in a student's career when the example of London performances is needed to illustrate the teaching of the most highly approved instructors. The executive musical talent of all the world is yearly displayed in London, and professors from all parts of Europe make that city their home; hence, it would be no slight of the merits of provincial musicians to invite them to act in association with a long-tried metropolitan body, to whose final charge and approbation the results of local teaching might be confided.—I am, dear Mr. Wrigley, faithfully yours, G. A. MACFARREN.

The Covent Garden Promenade Concerts are being continued with a frequent change of programme calculated to suit all tastes. At the first classical night of the new series was given Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and other smaller works, when the excellence of the orchestra, directed by Mr. A. Gwyllym Crowe was specially manifested. In portions of Beethoven's Septet, the following solo instrumentalists were heard to advantage:—Mr. Carrodus (violin), Mr. Hann (viola), Mr. Mann (horn), Mr. Clinton (clarinet), Mr. Hutchins (bassoon), Mr. E. Howell (violoncello); and Mr. E. Ould (double bass). Mdlle. D. Badia and Mr. Maas contributed vocal pieces with marked success. During the past week or so a national night and a Balfe night were among the attractions.

INDIA AND THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

A COMMITTEE has recently been formed with the object of supplying our Indian subjects with a version of the British National Anthem fitted for their use. Such a design is worthy of the support of all loyal people. Now that the QUEEN of ENGLAND has become EMPRESS of HINDOSTAN, the dusky millions who own her sway ought certainly to be afforded similar opportunities of displaying their loyalty, to those enjoyed by the other branches of our far-spreading empire. Space need not be wasted in commenting on the great importance that is rightly attached to the songs of a nation. Indeed, the dictum of ANDREW FLETCHER of Saltoun to the effect, that the national songs of a people are of greater importance than the laws manufactured for them, is to a certain extent true. The student of history will doubtless remember the important part that such songs have frequently played at certain crises in the history of nations. Whether the locale be Scotland, England, France, Germany, Russia, or Italy, it will be found that such songs have often not only greatly aided in preparing the minds of the people for changes that have affected the constitution of their country, but they have further nerved the arms of those fighting, and, when war was over, have also served to consolidate together a newly formed nation. The aim therefore of the "Committee of the National Anthem "for India" is both important and laudable. We occupy there a position altogether unique. About one hundred-and-twenty thousand Englishmen govern people numbering two hundred and seventy millions. Such a task requires the genius, intelligence and devotion, that are happily some of the characteristics of our fighting and colonizing race. And now that the various nations which inhabit this vast peninsula, whatever may be their diverse type or semi-independent status, have to acknowledge the supreme headship of the British Government, the attempt to unite them to us in closer bonds of loyalty becomes a matter of national utility.

But having admitted so much, it becomes our duty as practical people to look at the question in all its aspects, and see if the desire expressed is capable of realization. There are obstacles in the way, and moreover they are no slight ones. A person of ordinary intelligence, who has not specially thought on this subject, may wonderingly ask: What is the difficulty! is not music an universal language common to all civilized people, and do we not daily see words in connection with it, specially written for one nation, quickly and easily adapted to the speech and idioms of another? The answer to this query must necessarily be in the affirmative, but it should be observed that the general conditions which exist in Europe do not obtain in far away India. It may be remarked that, with the exception of those who have a practical acquaintance with the country, few of us have a correct idea of India. We are too apt to consider it as a sort of over-grown semi-civilized land, mainly inhabited by people of a similar type, and presenting in its general features more uniformity than is to be found in dis-united Europe. Almost the converse of this is the case. The area of the country nearly equals that of Europe proper, while its population is but little under that with which this entire continent is credited. Independently of the small native states owning the suzerainty of HER IMPERIAL MAJESTY, in the eight provinces into which India is divided there are several more languages spoken than are to be found in Europe entire; these languages differ from one another more than does English from French. Without dwelling on the divergence which exist between the feelings and ideas of its various peoples, it may suffice to point out, that whereas throughout Europe (even including Turkey) but one Supreme Being is acknowledged as GOD, in India each racial division has its particular gods, mutually abominating the divinities worshipped by the others. Finally, the musical tonality which prevails throughout Europe is as unintelligible to the Indians as is their peculiar mode to us.

From the above remarks it will be seen that there are two main impediments connected with the scheme proposed; the first has to do with the question of translation, while the second relates to the music proper. With regard to the linguistic difficulty, but little need be said here. It is evident that if the various nations of India are to sing the National Anthem, their version must contain sentiments that they can appreciate, and must be written in a language that they can understand. It will, therefore, be necessary to make as many translations as there are dialects. This can no doubt be done; but the difficulty of finding a precise equivalent for "GOD" seems likely to afford a bone of endless contention to the amateur theologists connected with the enterprise. The two divisions of Mohammedans would probably be satisfied with the name "ALLAH;" but to select from polytheistic concourse, worshipped by the various sects of Buddhists and Brahmins, the name of the particular deity to be invoked is indeed a formidable undertaking. Some of these sub-divisions utterly reject the favourite divinities of the others. It has been proposed to employ the Sanskrit word "DEVA," which, according to the authority of philologists, is the root of the Greek "Theos" and the Latin "Deus;" but though this word is used by the missionaries working in India, it is said to be practically unknown to the vast mass of the people. The creed of the Parsees being monotheistic, the task is an easier one. There appears to be yet another linguistic anxiety, viz., that of correctly translating the new title of EMPRESS. There may probably be some little trouble over the versification of Kaiser-i-Hind, but this is a matter which ought not to stop the way.

We now approach the consideration of the purely musical aspect of the question, and the obstacle here appears to be insuperable. The seven intervals, together with the chromatic semitones, into which the European octave has been divided, constitute the materials from which all our music is built up. No doubt this system has been gradually, perhaps arbitrarily, developed from the ancient pentatonic scale, but the science of acoustics has proved that our division is true to nature's laws. Having heard only these intervals from our childhood, we can appreciate no music except that constructed according to this scale. The Hindoos sub-divide their octave into twenty-two notes; thus, our music, founded on a scale divided into twelve sounds only, is as unintelligible to them as theirs proves to be to us. It is useless to dogmatise on this divergence, and assert that our method is alone right, or to say that Hindoo, Chinese, Japanese, Arab and all music differing from it must necessarily be mere uncouth noise. The fact that nations so ancient, so civilised, so distinguished for their literature and beautiful art productions, have for ages enjoyed their national music, proves that there are systems and systems. Indeed, according to the evidence of the learned Orientalist Sir William Jones, there is gratification to be obtained from Hindoo music. In view, then, of the great distinction that exists between Indian music and our own, one is anxious to know what the National Anthem Committee propose to do. Is an attempt to be made to engraft the hymn on the ancient raginees stem, or will the Committee boldly and simply supply the air and its attendant harmonies as we use it? Here is, indeed, a dilemma, and it appears impossible to avoid impalement on either horn. If the first supposition be adopted, then the Indian "God Save the Queen" will not be identical with our version; while, if the second course be followed, the untrained voices of the natives will be unable to sing sounds their ears cannot appreciate. A popular national hymn must be the true representative of the people's desires; it is not likely to be successful if manufactured for them extraneously. We know the old proverb as to the difficulty of making the horse drink the water to which he was led, and it is quite probable that a similar want of success will attend the well meant efforts of those who have entered upon this movement. It ought to cause some misgiving in their minds to reflect, that though the domiciled English people and our regimental bands have been singing and playing the National Anthem and other music for the last hundred years in the country, not a single melody has been retained, or any portion of our musical system adopted by the Hindoos. Despite the onward march of Western civilisation, in the case of so peculiar a conservatism as India exhibits, the time seems far distant when its natives will be qualified to adopt European music.

A word as to the version to be followed. We ought to know what is to be the precise text of the music selected, and hear whether it is true that a supposed improved edition of the words by a Rev. F. K. HARFORD is to be employed. This gentleman has eliminated what may be termed the damnatory clauses, and has turned their rough terseness into Christianity of another type. History shows that from time to time such improvements have been made. But whether they have been suggested by an outbreak of war-fever, the birth of a new prince, or a providential escape from the assassin, the improvements have survived their occasion but a brief period. If the Rev. Mr. HARFORD will but refer to the Bible, especially the Psalms, he will there find employed most of the expressions he has presumed to reject. If India is to be supplied with a new arrangement both of the words and music, she will certainly not possess the British National Anthem as we know it. Like the Irishman's oft mended coat, the original will have well-nigh disappeared under the patchings to which it has been subjected.

One is curious to know to whom the Committee is going to ascribe the authorship of the music. Will they follow the blunders of CLARK with his exploded fables about Dr. J. BULL, or adopt the theory now generally conceded that CAREY gave us the hymn in its present form?

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

I.

THE consideration of the construction of counterpoint in four parts involves, in the very presence of a fourth part, something of a new problem in the building up of the contrapuntal harmony, the constant handling of an overplus voice so to speak, seeing that as a general rule three parts may be made to express complete five-three chords and their six-three inversions. It may be here noted, however, that in consequence of enforced melodic progressions and resolutions of a more peremptory character in the movement of the external voices than in the action of the internal part, complete five-three or six-three harmony is frequently unattainable in three-part harmony; consequently one great use of harmony in four or more parts, is the power it possesses of securing completely formed chords. Sometimes, indeed, as in cadence points in which a two-fold obligation carries both the fifth of the dominant and its third, the leading-note, to the tonic, an important chord is shorn of one of its essential elements, either its fifth or its third; the ancients often preferred, perhaps, with an instinct for real strength, to sacrifice the third to the retention of the fifth, while modern writers almost invariably elect to give up the fifth and retain the weaker but sweeter sound of the third. So even four parts are not always sufficient to secure complete harmony in chords having only three elements, although as a general rule, four-part writing is found the best, as the clearest and most evenly balanced method of building up successive harmonies in their generally complete forms. Four part counterpoint may be said also to open another question for the student's consideration, the comparative immunity of the part actions from the law forbidding the hidden, covered or enclosed consecution of perfect concords, save as regards the relationship between the two outside parts. Even in the conduct of three-part counterpoint a few exceptions to the rule in question are not only found to be advisable, but now and then become absolutely necessary, as often between the two last bars when the canto fermo is not in the lowest part. Naturally the multiplication of parts, by crowding and restricting the movement of the different voices compels a leniency in this respect, which must become more and more elastic as the number of the employed parts increases. In short, this leniency with regard to covered consecutive perfect concords is more or less necessary in all examples in which the number of parts in action, exceeds the very limited number of directions in which part movements are possible. The student anxious to secure contrapuntal strength and independence, will do well, however, to appeal as little as possible to the relaxation of the rule concerning the presence of hidden consecutives. An unwise tendency to consider the rule as practically done away in four-part counterpoint as regards all part actions save the movements between the external voices, will inevitably lead to a weakness in the writing, and to a loss of time, for a given number of exercises written under notions of such wholesale relaxation will not impart half the clearness and strength to the writer's mind which may be secured by the more severe aspect of the question which will only permit such indulgent ease when absolutely inevitable. The wiser course for the student is a complete obedience to the spirit of the rule, which seeks as far as possible to enforce a power of independence in the part actions, without which faculty indeed counterpoint has little character or strength.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The following has been addressed by Mr. Gladstone to a leading musician :—

Sir,—The time has at last arrived when the affairs of the proposed Royal College of Music should be taken from the sphere of private endeavour to that of a State-supported institution. When I appeared on the platform at St. James's Palace, in company with the leader of her Majesty's Opposition, I was fully aware of the expectations that would naturally be roused by such a step. The only condition on which, in my mind, I made the grant of Government support dependent, was that sufficient interest should be shown by the public in the enterprise, and that that interest should take the practical form of subscriptions. Both conditions have been complied with to an unexpected degree, and in a manner not always as dignified as the character of the institution would have made desirable. Trade enterprise has connected itself with the movement, and the hope that the sun of royalty would shine on aldermanic autographs has been held out as a stimulus. It is time, Sir that this should cease, and before finally abandoning the control of the public purse strings, I am determined to unloose them once more in so excellent and harmonious a cause.

EXPERIENCES OF AN ORGANIST.

IV.

About this time there occurred in our church an event which, for a while, diverted attention from my delinquencies. The minister and deacons fell out. Our excitable parson preached a sermon on the doctrine of eternal punishment, and in the course of his eloquent remarks he showed so clearly the imminent danger of the sinner that I think the deacons began to feel alarmed about their own safety. Recollecting, perhaps, the many misdeeds which are a necessary part of every deacon's career, they took exception to this discourse, and found considerable fault with it. Now, if there is one thing which, more than any other, convinces me of the truth and justice of the doctrine referred to, it is the conduct of certain deacons whom I could name. Therefore it seems to me that the deacons, of all persons in the world, were the very last who should have found fault with the sermon. Nevertheless, such is the frailty of human nature that what is most for our good is often least to our liking. The deacons complained that their minister was too warm (as if anybody could be too warm on such a subject!). The minister retorted that his deacons were too cold. They said he was too sweeping in his denunciations. He replied that the church was full of spiritual cobwebs, and needed to be swept. And so they went on bandying words until at last neither he nor they could any longer be accurately described as either cold or warm, for all were decidedly hot, I think I may say piping hot.

The holy war, thus begun, was carried on with great spirit and energy on both sides, and in a few weeks the entire congregation was divided, like the House of Commons, into two hostile parties. A church-meeting was held forthwith. The proceedings were opened by the singing of a hymn :—

"Blest is the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love;" etc.

The minister then made a statement: the deacons disputed its accuracy; and a stormy discussion followed. The minister tendered his resignation: the deacons tendered theirs. He withdrew his resignation at the urgent request of his party: they, at the equally urgent request of their party, withdrew theirs. A great deal of talking ensued, but as the ordinary rules of debate were not scrupulously observed, the speakers sometimes coming forward in batches, instead of singly, as usual, it was difficult to hear, and, at this distance of time, is still more difficult to remember, what was said. I recollect, however, that somebody, who, though he had been speaking, or trying to speak, for a considerable period, had not succeeded in getting anybody to listen to him, suddenly accused somebody else's daughters of laughing at him, and referred to them contemptuously as "giggling girls." The father of these mirthful maidens rose to ask the chairman to protect his daughters from the insolence of the previous speaker. The previous speaker expressed his opinion that the "giggling girls'" father ought to be ashamed to show his face, as he had not paid his pew-rent. This accusation he shrieked out at the top of his voice. He was greeted with cries of "shame," and amid the confusion which followed, the chairman made many gallant attempts to restore order; but the assistance he received was so overwhelming that for a long time his efforts were unavailing. An indignant lady, sitting near me, uttered the word "viper," but whether the epithet was intended for the father of the injured damsels, or for their accuser, or for the chairman, it is impossible to guess. At last, however, the tumult subsided; the chairman announced that the discussion would be resumed next week, and the meeting was then closed with prayer.

The opposing spiritual forces were at first about equally matched, but the minister's party soon began to decrease in numbers, while the deacon's party continued to increase, and ere long the former found themselves in a small minority. The reason of this is easily explained. Our parson would persist in treating as his bitterest foes all who did not at once warmly and blindly espouse his cause, and, by this means, frightened the undecided and wavering into the camp of the enemy, and drove a good many of his friends in the same direction. The deacons, on the other hand, maintained a calm Christian bearing, which contrasted most favourably with the passion and vehemence of their "beloved but misguided pastor," as they called him, and was especially well calculated to draw towards them the deaf old ladies, of whom there were a good many in our church, and who could plainly see their angelic faces, but could not so plainly hear their less angelic voices. Hence, when the next church-meeting came round, and the call to arms was sounded, it was evident that the deacons and their followers must eventually get the best of the affray. Nevertheless the ministerialists (to borrow a parliamentary expression) were nothing daunted by the tremendous odds which were against them, but rather urged thereby to mightier feats of arms (if it be not incorrect to speak of arms when I mean tongues). They fought long and desperately, as Christian soldiers will, especially when fighting with one another. At last, amid an indescribable scene of confusion, the parson once more tendered his resignation, in an excited speech, in which he boldly denounced friend and foe alike, and then shutting his ears to the remonstrances which greeted him on all sides, vacated the chair, and strode hastily but majestically out of the room, breaking up the meeting in disorder, and, in his anxiety to escape the maledictions which were hurled at him as he disappeared through the door, quite forgetting the benediction which it was his duty to have pronounced.

Thus we found ourselves suddenly deserted by our spiritual head, and left to our own devices. We remained in this dangerous condition for about a year and a half, during which period the leading members of the congregation were so busy quarrelling among themselves that my humble doings as organist and choirmaster fortunately escaped their notice, and I was allowed to take my own course without interference of any kind. Making the most of my opportunity, I exerted myself strenuously to improve the singing, and am happy to say that my efforts were fairly successful. That they were not more so is due to the unsolicited assistance which I received from a young lady in the congregation, whose voice was more powerful than pleasing, and whose ear was not worthy of the trust she placed in it. This fair damsel had once applied for admission into the choir, and, being refused, chose to revenge herself by singing very loudly, very harshly, and very much out of tune in the gallery. Sometimes, therefore, our delicate pianissimo effects were marred, and our beautiful rallentando cadences spoilt, by the independent operations of this harassing young woman. Still, notwithstanding this militating influence (which, indeed, was only what might have been expected in such a church militant as ours), our Sunday performances were certainly above mediocrity, and compared favourably with those of many neighbouring congregations.

At last we got a new minister. If we could have more easily agreed among ourselves, we might have got one long before, for parsons are not scarce in this highly favoured land. Indeed, I fear the market is just now rather overstocked with that commodity. But a great many scenes, similar to those already described, had to be enacted before the deacons could contrive to persuade the congregation that the man on whom they (the deacons) had all along had their eye was the man whom providence had designed for the vacant office. However, after a long and patient struggle with many obdurate hearts, their praiseworthy endeavours were ultimately crowned with success, and the new minister was duly elected. He was a man of energy, and a man of action. His energy was so abundant that it enabled him not only to attend to his own business, but to assist in that of every member of his flock, and his thirst for action was so great that he was no sooner settled among us than he began to look about for something to reform. Going round on his pastoral visits, he was speedily made acquainted, by the musical malcontents of the church, with my sins. Calling upon my former patron, the oracle, he learned that great man's candid opinion of me, which was that I was "a very obstinate young man." Here, then, was something for him to reform. What more fitting object for reformation than this obstinate organist, this stubborn sinner, who had so far forgotten his position as to assume the entire control of the music of the church. So, having now a noble purpose in view, he continued his professional perigrinations with greater zest, and by the time they were over, he had gathered together such a mass of evidence against the unsuspecting organist, as convinced him that that self-willed young man was, in his unreformed state, a dangerous enemy of religion, and that prompt and decisive action was absolutely necessary in order to save the church from impending ruin.

He took an opportunity of paying me a visit, or perhaps I should call it a visitation, and proceeded to favour me with his views on music in general and church music in particular. As he knew nothing whatever about music of any kind, it may be imagined that his discourse on this occasion was more amusing than instructive. He talked enthusiastically of the great masters, among whom he included Mr. Sankey, of the firm of Moody and Sankey, the American Revivalists, who were then performing at the Agricultural Hall. He strongly recommended me to go and hear that "sweet singer of Israel," as a means of improving my taste, which he rather broadly hinted was much in need of improvement. I promised to go, for I saw that he would not be satisfied unless I did. Then, after he had kindly pointed out all my defects as an organist, and as a leader of congregational psalmody (and, looked at from his musicianly point of view, they were by no means insignificant), he took his leave, apparently under the pleasing impression that he had discharged a very delicate duty in a very delicate manner.

DUAL TEMPERAMENT.

A correspondent writes thus:—

SIR,—In order to improve our harmony, I suggest the use of duplicate flutes, hautboys, bassoons, etc., like the clarionets. For pianos and organs, a slide from right to left might shift one note in each octave, leaving room for a total of five or six duplicate strings or pipes. The finger keys would not be altered or moved, but only the five or six swivel or jointed levers. After much thought and experience, I freely present this idea to all who may work it out, and I name it the dual temperament.

My theory is, that if you add one note to each octave, and divide the diluted "wolf" or discord into two parts, you practically conquer it. A 24th part of the "wolf" is very different from a 12th part. Slightly imperfect fifths will yearn and yield to perfect neighbours, but with the present scale they refuse to accommodate us. The rule would be—humour most the sharp keys, to suit strings in C, G, D, A, and E, and drive the very small discord to the extra note provided. Moral:—Attend to the fifths, and leave the thirds and accidentals to take care of themselves. Odd sharps or flats are but passing notes, and even they would be better than at present. Thirds, we know, may be variable without offending us, but fifths—oh! murder!—listen to prolonged fifths on wolfish flutes and hautboys! The simple chords opening the "Midsummer" overture are rarely endurable. The twofold clarionets seldom annoy us. Then, as to bassoons, Chopin foolishly wrote a unison passage (in a piano concerto) for bassoon and piano. The scale was B minor, ascending, and it was not a little, but shockingly out of tune. I thought, does anyone notice this, or am I a hair-splitting maniac? Fortunately the eminent pianist stopped. "Cannot you play that better in tune? it makes one quite nervous." "No, Monsieur;" and on went the rehearsal. The bassoonist was a first-rate solo player, but he required a duplicate bassoon. If you provide two wind instruments, you must greatly improve matters; just as a brass band, using a few flat keys, can be better in tune than a present mixed orchestra. I know that in bands where all are "professors" and musicians, the notes are often raised and depressed, but this art is confined to a few. We want to raise all music in the scale of excellence. Remember, also, the outer world. A fine ear is no artist's monopoly. I have known outsiders with most acute perceptions of discord, and wincing when the best performers were playing a piano trio. The late masterly flautist, Richardson, could "whine" up a passage like sliding a finger on a violin; but it is impossible to know the wants of every chord without looking at a score. Therefore, I say, raise the whole platform of music and simplify where possible. Expense is nothing for such an object. As to 'cellists and violinists, they stand on a quicksand when playing with the piano. They screw this, and unscrew that, yet they can never enjoy repose or comfort; so that all tends to swell the chorus of—Reform it altogether. Let us hope for a speedy release. Yours truly,

Jan. 6th, 1883. ANTI-WOLF.

P.S.—In time we may arrive at triple temperament with two D sharps, or two E naturals. There is room for fourteen notes where now are twelve. In any case, we are on the right road. Directions: Shave part of C lever; bend B flat lever close to C, leaving room for a swivel on B flat lever, to act on B flat (No. 1), and B flat (No. 2). The visible finger keys would remain exactly as at present. Of course a perfectly tuned "'cello" gives out a C painfully different from that of the pianoforte. This should be altered. One of the world's greatest organ builders writes:—"If a couple more notes could be introduced into the scale, we might have more satisfaction in listening to a tempered organ; 'one note would be a good step.'" A learned maker says:—"The bassoon is lamentably deficient." Another:—"No escape but by separate instruments."

GOSSIP ABOUT ROSSINI.

Rossini lived then in the Rue Basse du Rempart, a street which has nearly disappeared now, but he soon settled down in those larger apartments at the corner of the Boulevard des Italiens and the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin.

I must, for the clear understanding of what follows, give a slight description of these apartments. From the ante-room you enter the dining-room, a moderate-sized oblong table to seat fourteen people filling it nearly wholly. To the right of it was the drawing-room where on Saturday nights the famous soirées were given which brought together celebrities of every class or section of politics, art, science, or financial position; to the left was his studio—in fact, his bedroom—a square little place, containing a bed, a writing table, a Pleyel piano, and a wardrobe full of perishable linen and his imperishable manuscripts. On the little table in his bedroom he wrote them—on the big dining-room table the copyist copied them, because he never allowed a manuscript to go out of his house.

It is certainly incredible that he should have written the "Barber of Seville" in fifteen days, not that there can be the slightest doubt about the spontaneity of the melodies streaming quicker into his pen than out of it, but precisely because, although writing very fast, he had a way of rounding the head of the notes which took time, and writing a whole operatic score in a fortnight does not allow of many wasted minutes.

Donizetti wrote quickly, to such an extent that when I saw him write for the first time I did not think he was writing music. He had a knack of covering the pages with dots like a telegraph strip, and when he had done so he added the tails and lines. Rossini used to set to work at ten o'clock in the morning, having got up at nine. From ten to twelve, while he wrote, numbers of people came—some with letters of introduction, or old friends, and so on. He was very glad to make the acquaintance of talented young artists; and received them with immense kindness, giving them advice, and sometimes letters. But what he absolutely hated was to be stared at as one of the sights of Paris.

Once his old friend Caraffa came and told him:—"There is a Russian Princess on the boulevard who waited two hours yesterday to see you pass. She wants so much to make your acquaintance. What shall I tell her?" "Tell her," said Rossini, "that I am excessively fond of asparagus. She need only go to Potel et Chabot and buy the finest bunch she can get and bring it here. I shall then get up, and, after she has well inspected me in front, I shall turn round, and she can complete her inspection by taking the other view, too; and then she may go."

He was rather fond, not only of asparagus, but of anything good to eat, and whenever he was sent some delicacy in that line he enjoyed it in advance by unpacking it himself, and then he used to say with delighted looks:—"Viola a quio la gloire est bonne." His visitors gone or not at twelve, he put on his wig, which until then lay quietly on the table, his big bald head being covered with a towel for the time being; then he dresses, and by one o'clock every day he went. He took the first cab he met and asked:—"Est-ce que vos chevaux sont fatigues?" When the unfortunate driver says "Non, Monsieur," he never took him, he never would trust himself to other than tired horses, and during all his life never had he entered a railway carriage.

Then he usually drove to the Palais Royal, in the latter days to the Passage de l'Opera, and walked up and down in the shaded galleries, meeting a number of friends and hearing with great interest all the newest gossip about singers, composers, and operatic chat in general.—Temple Bar.

A special correspondent of the Daily News, in a recent account of Arabi's past political position, tells how the people applauded Arabi Pacha's contemptuous remarks on the State subsidy of £9,000 to the Cairo Opera House, a "wretched imitation," as he described it, of Paris and Vienna, which "corrupted the morals of our youth." The speaker delared he would much prefer that the money should be paid for keeping the Opera House closed. But he would be still better pleased if the money were spent upon village schools, for lack of which the people must necessarily remain in their immemorial ignorance.

Academical Intelligence.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON

The authorities of Trinity College, London, have just completed the details of the "Henry Smart Scholarship." The following are some of the regulations :—

Candidates must be British subjects by birth, and at the date of examination must not be over eighteen years of age.

Candidates must produce a satisfactory certificate of moral character from a clergyman, magistrate, or other responsible person.

The Examination for the Scholarship will be held shortly before the commencement of the academical year, in September, 1883.

Candidates may offer as the principal subject of examination either the Organ or the Pianoforte, to which they may add such other practical or theoretical subjects as they may desire for the purposes of the Competition, subject to the approval of the Board.

In the subjects of Organ or Pianoforte playing candidates must submit for performance before the Examiners any one or more compositions from Section D of the Official List of the College, Pianoforte or Organ (Senior Division), of the Regulations of the Local Examinations in Instrumental and Vocal Music, which also may be had of the Secretary. In the optional subjects, candidates desiring to offer them must clearly state the pieces or standard of work in which they ask to be examined.

Conspicuous merit in at least one of the principal subjects will be essential to success, and artistic appreciation no less than technical skill will be requisite.

The successful candidate will receive the value of the Scholarship in the form of free instruction during a period of three consecutive academical years in three subjects, having his own choice thereof, with the proviso that the Organ shall in any case be one of the prescribed subjects during the entire course of the Scholarship. The Scholar shall also attend upon any additional classes, lectures, practice, College performances or rehearsals, free of College fees, which the Board or Chief Director of Studies may deem desirable ; and the said Scholar shall be expected to pass the Public Examinations of the College, in due course, but no examination fee will in such cases be required.

DONIZETTI.

The Corriere di San Remo publishes the following interesting letters by John Ruffini, who while in Paris composed the libretto of Don Pasquale for Donizetti, describing the state of that master towards the close of his life :—

Paris, March 29, 1847.

I have just returned from a long and sad visit. For some time I had felt a lively desire to see poor Donizetti once more before he left this world. He is in the Maison de Santé, about an hour's distance from Paris. I was there to-day with Accursi. I have never seen a more pitiable spectacle : a man with scarcely the form of man ; an inhert machine which has outlasted its extinguished intelligence and soul. He occupies at Ivry, in a house destined for lunatics, a small apartment on the ground floor, consisting of a small parlour and bedroom. He has the use of a little garden, in which we found him walking. When I say walking I only use a mode of speech, for he was strongly supported by a servant on each side, and scarcely helped himself, generally allowing his legs to drag. His neck was bent on his left shoulder generally, as was the case all to-day ; his eyes are closed. For the rest, he showed neither pleasure at our visit nor regret at our departure. His left hand is closed convulsively, so that the nails wound the palm. He rarely plants his whole foot on the ground, but stands on the heel or the toes. His whole body is periodically agitated by nervous jerks. In short he gave me exactly the impression of a man struck by the hand of God, and changed into a beast. Such must have been Nebuchadnezzar. . . . JOHN RUFFINI.—"Paris April 19, 1847. You exaggerate, my dear, the effect produced on me by the miserable state of poor Donizetti. Apart from the first sad impression, to tell the truth, the sight only left an intense feeling of compassion, and natural reflections on the nothingness and misery of men and of human things. Provident nature, who watches over the preservation both of the individual and the species, has furnished us with a kind of philosophical indifference to evils which have no remedy and, so to speak, exceed the limits of our capabilities of suffering. The evils of this world are so many hat if we could feel them all with the intensity claimed by every special case we should be so many Jobs, doing nothing but complain, stretched on our beds and strewing ashes on our heads, and God knows how the world would run. Nature therefore, outside of a small circle whose sorrows are our own, has given us a safety-valve in a kind of egoism ; the evils without the bounds of this small circle have only the rights to draw from us a limited quantity of sensibility almost subject to our will. Such is my case with regard to Donizetti. I deplore in him the genius so precipitated to the abyss, the magnificent star extinguished before its setting. I suffer for him, so to say, by reflection ; but my heart is very little interested in the question, at least far less than you seem to imagine. He never valued me otherwise, and I believe he never really liked any one in the world. He found his account in making use of me, as I found mine in being of use to him. There were cordial relations between us, but it was a friendship and plastic cordiality that never penetrated below the skin. . . . .—JOHN RUFFINI."

Passing Events.

Mr. Poznanski was engaged to play some violin solos at Swindon on Wednesday night.

Mr. F. Kingsbury has been appointed to the professorship of singing at the Blackheath Conservatoire of Music.

Signor Villa, a baritone of great merit, has recently sung in the provinces with success. At Bedford he sustained the part of "Elijah" so efficiently as to receive the thanks of Mr. Diemer, the conductor.

Under the will of the late Richard Ellison, Esq., of Sudbrooke Holme, Lincolnshire, a legacy of £500 has been left to the Choir Benevolent Fund Society, which is established for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the lay clerks in cathedrals and collegiate churches.

On Thursday, January 4th, the Choral Society of St. Asaph, gave a performance of Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Florence Norman and Mr. Levison Wyatt were the vocalists engaged. Master Myrick Roberts presided at the piano, and Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

The Academical Board of Trinity College, London, has lately awarded the following Medals :—Silver Medal for Diligence and Regularity to Francis Poyson ; Bronze Medal for Diligence and Regularity to Edith G. Collet ; Silver Medal to Joseph Curtis, as the best student in the class for Musical Acoustics.

A highly interesting feature in the programme of the ensuing season of the Philharmonic Society, says the Musical World, will be a MS. motet by Cherubini. The MS. had been for many years in the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace, and Her Majesty the Queen has graciously given her consent to the performance of it by the Philharmonic Society. The work has never yet been heard in public.

The current number of Mr. Walford's Antiquarian Magazine and Bibliographer contains, inter alia, an interesting article on "An Unique MS. Collection of Ancient Church Music" contained in the library of the College of Peterhouse, Cambridge. It illustrates the choral service of the Church of England during the period immediately preceding the great rebellion.

Mr. Algernon Ashton announces that he will give a concert on the 20th, at which a selection from his compositions of chamber music will be performed at the request of Mr. and Mrs. Holiday and other friends. The scheme includes :—Trio in E flat for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ; sonata in D for pianoforte and violin ; and quartet in F sharp minor for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello.

The Athenæum says :—"The compositions of Theodore Kirchner are but little known in this country, and some interest attached to the performance of eight numbers of his 'Novelletten,' Op. 59, for piano, violin, and violoncello, at Mr. Dannreuther's concert on Thursday week. The comparatively few master-minds of music inevitably influence a number of more modestly gifted workers in the art, and Kirchner may in this way be deemed a disciple of Schumann. His works are mostly for the pianoforte and are nearly all of small calibre. In the 'Novelletten' the keyed instrument is far more effectively treated than are the strings ; but on the whole these little pieces are extremely pleasing and some of them really charming."

It is announced that "Olivette" will be revived at the Avenue Theatre this evening.

Arrangements for a season of Richter Concerts are completed. Herr Richter will direct nine concerts to be given at St. James's Hall during May and June. To Herr Frantzen will again be confided the responsibility of rehearsing the chorus.

It is stated that Messrs. Spiers and Pond (Limited) are in negotiation for the purchase or hiring of the Alexandra Palace and Park. If the negotiations succeed the Palace will probably re-open on Easter Monday, under their control and management.

The first of a series of ballad concerts at Stratford Town-hall, was given on Monday evening by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee, in aid of the funds for the establishment of a Sea-side Convalescent Home for Working men. Among the artists announced were Mdme. Edith Wynne, Miss Agnes Larkcom, and Mr. John Radcliffe (flute). The Sea-side Home will be worked in connection with the Hospital Saturday Fund, and will be rendered, it is hoped, self-supporting. The president is Mr. Samuel Morley, and the treasurer Mr. H. N. Hamilton Hoare.

A contemporary says the increasing importance of comic opera seems likely to attract the attention of other leading writers for the stage besides Mr. Gilbert. The libretto of the forthcoming opera, "Nell Gwynne," to which M. Planquette is now composing the music, is from the pen of Mr. Dion Boucicault. The new work has, we believe, been secured by Mr. Henderson. Mr. G. R. Sims has likewise written the libretto of a new operetta, which is being set to music by Mr. Frederic Clay, composer of "Princess Toto." It will, we believe, be produced by Miss Kate Santley at the Royalty about Easter time.

The Sacred Harmonic Society announces a series of four concerts, to be given on Friday evenings, at St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Charles Hallé. "The Redemption" will be given on February 23rd, "Elijah" on April 6th, Schubert's Mass in E flat and the "Lobgesang" on April 27th, and "The Messiah" on May 11th. The scheme is acknowledged to be mainly experimental, but the Council declare their intention of issuing "a much more comprehensive prospectus for the season 1883-84." The performances will be looked forward to with much interest, and the good wishes of all will be with the rejuvenescent society.

At the meeting of the Musical Association, on January 1st, Mr. C. A. Barry occupied the chair. Mr. E. J. Breakspeare read a paper on "Musical Æsthetics," being a continuation of a paper on the same important subject with which Mr. Breakspeare has thoughfully identified himself, contributed by him two years since. The lecturer admitted the difficulties surrounding a practical treatment of the subject, but advocated the formation of a more definite system of criticism of musical works in their æsthetic aspect, as apart from their scientific aspect. Alluding to the loose phraseology and rough-and-ready manner usually adopted by journalistic critics, Mr. Breakspeare acknowledged the comparative poverty of the English language in terms conveying slight but significant variations of meaning. A brief discussion followed, in which Mr. F. Praeger, Mr. Bannister, and Mr. J. S. Shedlock took part. On February 5, a paper will be read by Mr. Baillie Hamilton, the inventor of the Vocalion.

M. Alfred Talandier, a deputy, lately submitted an influentially signed bill to the Chamber of Deputies with the view of reorganizing the regimental bands in the French army, the existence of which he declares is threatened. In the preamble he states that in 1867 Marshal Niel suppressed the bands in the cavalry, and with regard to those in the infantry, M. Félix Germain, in a work called the "Dictionnaire du Budget," expresses a widely prevalent opinion when he says that the millions of francs which are expended annually upon musicians and instruments are simply a waste of money. M. Talandier proposes therefore to add to the utility of the bandsmen. He would enact that in every regiment there should be a separate company trained to perform a double service—in time of peace playing in the band and attending ambulance-drill, and in time of war acting as auxiliaries to the hospital corps. It is to be hoped that a more liberal spirit will prevail with regard to the preservation and development of the many excellent military orchestras possessed by France.

BY FRANCIS EDWARD GLADSTONE, MUS.DOC.

You will remember that we formed our scale from three triads, each consisting of a major 3rd and perfect 5th placed above a given note. The idea of such a combination of sounds is obviously suggested by nature's chord, to which reference has been already made in connection with the scale. Further, the idea of making the 5th of one chord the connecting link between it and another one similarly composed as to intervals, is also derived from the harmonic series.

The harmonic chord contains three sounds which, because of their more frequent repetition, are more prominent than others. These three sounds are the root or generator, the perfect 5th, and the major 3rd. Taking the series up to the 32nd harmonic from we find six C's, four G's and three E's. Here is the chord thus arising :—

Ex. 6. A.

But if we take the 3rd harmonic as a fresh starting point we shall find that the addition to it of the 6th, 9th, 12th, 15th, 18th, 24th, and 30th harmonics gives us the following chord,—all the intervals in which are, like those of the former, in perfect tune :—

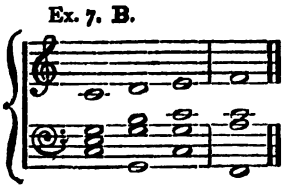
Ex. 6. B.

From this it may be fairly argued that the progression from one major chord to another a 5th above it is in accordance with the suggestions of nature. Now, if we accompany the first three notes of the ascending scale of C with, to use the ordinary technical terms, "tonic" and "dominant" harmony, we obtain a result perfectly satisfactory so far as it goes, and we might leave off at this point without any feeling of disturbance :—

Ex. 7. A.

If, however, we proceed to the next chord,

Ex. 7. B.



we feel that we have entered another harmonic region, and there is a slight sense of unrest until after passing through the new country, the sudden re-appearance of the "dominant" harmony of C, followed by the "tonic" chord, brings us back to the same land whence we took our departure.

Ex. 7. C.

Of course I am aware that it is the custom of musicians to speak of the chord upon the 4th degree of the scale as the "subdominant" chord. No doubt this is a convenient term, but that it is somewhat misleading, and that its influence in the scale is rather disturbing than governing, I will now further endeavour to shew.

Let us begin to descend our scale. The first two chords stand in the same relationship towards one another as that of the first two chords in the ascending scale, and we might return to C with perfectly good effect :—

Ex. 8. A.

But in attempting to descend another step our way is blocked. There is a clear gap between the two chords, for they have not a note in common :—

Ex. 8. B.

You may ask why this want of connection was not noticed in ascending. I reply, that it was felt to some extent. There is always something like a wrench experienced in passing, with similar motion between Soprano and Bass, from the common chord on the subdominant to that on the dominant, but this twist is not unwelcome when it leads us towards our key note, whereas it is very much so when it takes us from it.

I am anxious not to be misunderstood in this matter. I hold that the charm of all musical progressions lies in the fact that when, a given tonality having been established, we wander away through chords or keys more or less related to one another, we can by similar means always return to our starting point. Musicians are divided as to what constitutes an actual modulation, or change of key, but there can be no serious difference of opinion as to what produces a change of HARMONIC relationship. The note C as a generator can only produce two major chords, viz. :—that of C (the tonic) and that of G (the dominant), but the chord of C is also generated by the note F in the scale of C; and it thus has a dual relationship of the most intimate kind: it is the tonic of G, but the dominant of F. The use by Church composers of what is known as the "plagal cadence" affords an apparent, but not, I think, a real contradiction to this view. When, after a series of passages in any key, the concluding chords are built upon the subdominant and tonic of that key, I always feel that a mental reference is made to the dominant harmony, and that in a passage like the following:—

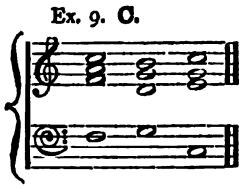
Ex. 9. A.

used as a cadence, the following intervening chord,

Ex. 9. B.

is as it were, understood, the complete phrase standing thus:—

Ex. 9. C.



On this point I may quote with advantage a paragraph from Mr. Banister's excellent treatise on Music. He says with reference to the plagal cadence: "This cadence is not used as a substitute for the perfect cadence, not being nearly so indicative of key, but as an appendix to it." It is, in fact, only effective when the key has already been thoroughly re-established. But if in our movements from chord to chord we were restricted to tonic and dominant harmonies, and if we had no concords but those with major 3rds above the root, our music would soon become tedious: we should be satiated with its unvarying sweetness. As a matter of fact, we know that, in progressions from chord to chord, a due intermingling of minor with major chords produces the most satisfactory result. Let us then proceed to consider the nature and origin of the minor triad and scale. Helmholtz's theory of consonance shews us why the interval of a minor 3rd produces a satisfactory effect to the ear, but musicians are not unanimous in their opinions as to the proper derivation and scientific construction of the modern minor scale. It must I think be admitted that the minor scale is more artificial than the major, but, although I am treading on debatable ground, I will venture to offer you a method of construction which commends itself to me. Turning again to the harmonic range extending upwards from the octave below we shall find in addition to the two major chords

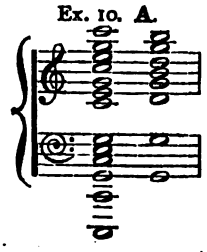
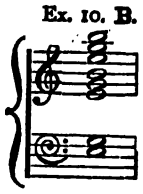
Ex. 10. A.



a series of sounds which may be united to form a minor chord

Ex. 10. B.



the intervals which it comprises being perfectly in tune; that is to say, G is a true minor 3rd, and B is a perfect 5th above E.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

These concerts were resumed last Saturday with the following programme:—

Quartet in A minor, Op. 13, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Mendelssohn.
MM. Straus, L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti.
Air, "Nasce al bosco" ..... Handel.
Mr. Santley.
"Carnaval" ("Scènes Mignonnes"), Op. 9, for pianoforte alone ..... Schumann.
Mdme. Sophie Menter.
Saltarella, Op. 55, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... Molique.
Herr Straus.
Song, "Le Nom de Marie" ..... Gounod.
Mr. Santley.
Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Beethoven.
Mdme. Sophie Menter, MM. Straus and Piatti.
Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

Herr Straus's earnest and musicianly leadership is always productive of satisfying results. His solo by the graceful writer Bernhard Molique, whom our programme compares, not unjustly, to Spohr, was received with enthusiastic appreciation. The great charm in Herr Straus is his perfect simplicity—his entire absence of affectation and struggle for effect. If his mantle of simplicity could fall on Mdme. Menter's shoulders she would have a greater charm—at least, to me. Anything more restless, rubato and ranting, than her interpretation of the Carnival Scenes could scarcely be imagined. If some one word of direction to the player could be affixed to each of these scenes, it would be the one word semplice, which is attached to the "Valse Allemande." If they do not captivate the hearer by their natural grace and quaint humour, no amount of affectation in the performance can render them captivating, though it may—for a fearful power is in the hands of the interpreter—render them something only a degree removed from vulgar. Where was the beauty and where was the sense of taking the "Valse Allemande" quite slowly instead of molto vivace, as directed, and hurrying the last four bars most ungracefully to a close? What was the meaning of "Coquette" being begun three times as fast as it was continued? What satisfactory result arose from the odd liberties taken with the time in "Arlequin," and the forced expression given to the second part of "Reconnaissance"?

Alas, poor Schumann! Though he has himself written concerning this Opus 9 of his: "One piece after another was completed during the carnival season of 1835, in a serious mood, and under peculiar circumstances. I afterwards gave titles to the numbers, and named the entire collection 'The Carnival'"; the programmist still contends (and very likely he may be right) that they were begun in "1834 and finished in 1835." It really would not matter which way it was, if he did not continue to tell us that "Beethoven or Mendelssohn would have done it in a couple of days." If this speech did not call to mind the lady who said that her daughter must play better than her teacher, for when they were playing a duet the daughter always reached the bottom of the page first, it would have to be accepted as a reflection on Schumann's genius. But how senseless an one! Beethoven wrote 12 bagatelles for piano, beginning in 1820 and ending in 1822, and published them as Op. 119. Schumann wrote 21 bagatelles for piano in a shorter space of time, and published them as Op. 9. Wherein, then does Schumann differ from his great forerunner? Next time the Carnival Scenes are played a stronger argument or none at all had better be put forth.

Mr. Santley was in magnificent voice, and sang the song whose fame he has made, as well as that by Handel, in his own perfect manner.

Well may "praisers of past times" expatiate on the inexhaustable beauty of Mozart's compositions! The programme book of Monday used by the writer might be compared with the edition of Racine's dramas, every page whereof was figuratively marked by Voltaire with the words "fine, pathetic, harmonious, sublime." This eighth quartet, written a year before Mozart's death, is pregnant with grace and refinement throughout, apart from the ideas in the abstract, and only to speak of their treatment. A vein of purest melody, and the use of counterpoint without a tinge of pedantry. The allegretto (second movement) in C reminds one of Haydn's humorous style. The trio of the Minuet, with its passages of thirds and distant intervals of thirteenth, fifteenth, and tenth in the upper part, was applauded to the echo. The allegro finale, played quasi presto, is a specimen of a spirit "touched to finest issues;" and the violoncello part reveals most of the quaint fun so frequently found in the texts of "Papa" (Haydn). Schumann's Quartet, by the Germans unaccountably preferred to the earlier Quintet in the same key, naturally checked any premature exodus from the Hall, except in the case of the incorrigibles, who have not even the decency to depart between the movements, but skulk out during the performance.

Mdme. Menter, whose fine and forcible execution in the Quartet could not efface the impression always made by Mdme. Schumann, to whom the interpretation of her husband's works was a labour of love, and love's labour not lost, made a good choice of Chopin's Polonaise, the sixth and the most popular. Great power, manifest in the delivery of the main subject, was blended with exquisite grace and delicacy in the episodical portions; the sotto voce subject in E major, with octaves in the bass, sempre staccato, may be specially noted. On a rapturous encore, Mdme. Menter played the "Study" (of black keys) in G flat; she used a Erard grand.

Your other contributor will speak of the Saturday afternoon performance, and the grand execution of Schumann's "Le Carnaval," which attracted all the critics.

Corelli's interesting Violin Sonata gave great satisfaction; fine music, and not too old-fashioned for us moderns of catholic and cultivated taste. The tone of the fourth string, the finesse of the scale passages, and the abandon of the style in the quick movements, secured for Mdme. Norman-Néruda a vociferous recall. Mr. Henderson, the vocalist, excelled more in Schubert's "Ständchen" than in the excerpt from "Acis and Galatea," of which the reading struck me as tame and passionless. How admirably it was rendered at Drury Lane Theatre in 1842, by Mrs. German Reed (then Miss Priscilla Horton), when Mr. Macready so splendidly "mounted" the Cantata, will not be forgotten by one at least. Schubert's charming lied is said by Herr Doppler to have been improvised at a village inn, on the back of the bill of fare, for want of proper paper, amidst a clatter of plates and glasses, the noise of skittles, the playing of fiddles, and the rush of waiters! So Pestal, the Polish captive, scratched his valse on the wall of his dismal dungeon.

On Monday next Mr. Charles Hallé is to conduct Brahms's Pianoforte Trio in C, Op. 87 (first time of performance). A. M.

MR. AGUILAR'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Of these agreeable and edifying réunions the third and last (of the present Christmas series) was held at Mr. Aguilar's own house on Wednesday afternoon. His first pièce de résistance on the occasion—"a dainty dish" indeed to set before the assembled queens—was Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, "Op. 31, No. 2." It may be remembered that the first of this fine triad, the one in G major, was played at the recital of January 3rd. The Sonata in D minor is known to be a favourite with classical pianists of both sexes. The text cannot be interpreted, even if tolerably played, by ordinary amateurs. The alternation, at the outset, of the "recitative" subject (largo) with the allegro requires of itself something more than a "'prentice hand"; whilst the adagio (second movement) in B flat, which opens with that charming and most effective change from the treble to the bass clef, can only be entrusted, so to speak, to a patte de velours encased in white kid glove. The delicately accentuated rhythm of the final allegretto (proportionately larger than the other movements), with its chromatic runs and arpeggio accompaniment, would be simply assassinated by feebleness and school-girl treatment. Mr. Aguilar's reading of the sonata may be commended as scrupulously reverent, with an intellectual observance of all lights and shades—in the sonata as numerous as the colours of a sun-lit wood in the latter days of autumn.

Mr. Aguilar's own (MS.) sonata of three movements in E major was played by him later on, and suffered no eclipse by comparisons. The first allegro is charmingly playful in style, and with some fiery passages of passionate remonstrance, a certain tuneful theme very often recurrent, may be called bewitching. The Andante in G, an air varie, has many traits of excellence, and a sort of stately chorale at the close dignifies the movement. The finale, allegretto scherzando, is what the title imports—gay, spirited, and full of espièglerie. Here a powerful left hand thunders out a bass, which the right relieves with poetical passages in the upper part of the instrument; the movement is admirably worked up. One of Mr. Aguilar's shorter compositions, the "Ophelia" in D flat, is a clever combination of the sweet girl's gentleness and piety (according to the Shakspearean theory) with an episodical agitato strikingly suggestive of the more tragical features in the play; a second theme in the subordinate key characterises the piece in "tone" language. The transcription from Mr. Aguilar's cantata, "Summer Night," and a melody, "At Last," in A major, very sweet, and with the tune well "picked out" in the upper register, evoked much applause; the melody, in fact, was encored, but Mr. Aguilar, too unobtrusive, modestly declined to repeat the piece. Effective transcriptions of a sarabande, from Bach's violin sonatas, and a gigue from the "Orchestral Suite," served to show how the old masters could move the world, even through the medium of dance music. The graceful "Dream Dance" in A, and the "Couleur de Rose" in A flat, always regale the ear as sprightly "motives," likely to stir up people disposed to dance, and most daintily dealt with by their accomplished composer. A fugue of Scarlatti in D minor; Liszt's 9th Hungarian Rhapsody in E flat; Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's beautiful "Allegro grazioso" in A major, a long piece, marked "Opus 18"; and two "Lieder ohne Worte" completed a choice scheme. Mr. Aguilar, in the case of Mendelssohn's "Lieder," chose Nos. 1 and 4 from Book II., in E flat and B minor, known as "Contemplation," and "L'Egaré." Poor Lubeck played the first-named "lied" at the Musical Union one day—A.D. 1869 or 1870.

Easter, this year, falls very early, so that the Spring recitals of Mr. Aguilar will not long "loom in the distance."

Mr. J. F. Barnett is said to be getting well forward with his delicate task of completing the score of an unfinished symphony by Schubert.

SWINDON.

The committee of the Mechanics' Institution, New Swindon, Wilts, held a grand concert on the evening of January 10th, under the able direction of Mr. P. E. Van Noorden. The conductor opened the concert with the pretty overture to Nicolai's opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," arranged as a duet for the pianoforte; the primo part was played by Miss Nellie Sykes, and the secondo by Mr. Van Noorden. Herr Poznanski played two violin solos with signal success, namely, Signor Hauser's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" and De Beriot's "Tremolo." Miss Nellie Sykes played a grand fantasia for the pianoforte on American airs, by Sivrai, and Mr. J. A. Brousil some pleasing violoncello pieces by Reber, Dunkler, and Servais. Mdme. Dukas sang Gounod's "Ave Maria" with great taste and expression to the accompaniment of Herr Poznanski on the violin, and Mr. Van Noorden on the harmonium. Some of the London artists were obliged to return to Paddington by the late, or rather the early train, which leaves Swindon at about 2 o'clock, a.m.

ST. ALBANS.

A good amateur concert was given in the Town Hall, St. Albans, on Friday, the 12th inst., under the patronage of several influential ladies in the county. The proceeds were devoted to building a village-room at Colney Heath, a hamlet near St. Albans. The platform was beautifully decorated with palms and other exotics. Among the items in the programme that are worthy of notice were the songs of Mrs. Pagden (née Miss Ferrari), who kindly consented to appear and sing "Clover Blooms" (F. Moir), and Gounod's "Serenade" (violin obbligato, M. Romer), in the latter of which this lady's charming voice was heard at its best, and as an encore she gave "My heart is sair for somebody." The pianoforte duet "Tancredi" was played in a most finished style by Mrs. Marten and Miss Andrews. The violin solo by Mr. Romer, and his duet with Mrs. Marten, fantasia from "Guillaume Tell," were heartily appreciated by the audience. Mr. Dundas Gardiner gave "Rochester Bells" and "I fear no foe." The programme concluded with a trio, very well sung by Mrs. Pagden, Mr. Thorley, and Mr. Dundas Gardiner, "I Naviganti" (A. Randegger). Miss Ferrari acted as accompanist Unfortunately very few people were present, and this is to be wondered at, as it is so seldom the inhabitants of St. Albans get a chance of hearing good music in their own town.

BRIGHTON.

A series of organ recitals, under the management of Mr. Alfred King, Mus.Bac. (Honorary Organist to the Corporation) was commenced in the Dome. The series just inaugurated promises to prove unusually attractive, several of the eminent organists of the town having kindly promised their services in giving recitals. The programme was carried out by Mr. King, and it was gratifying to notice that the room, though not crowded, was better filled than at any of the previous recitals given on the Dome organ. Mr. King was in his best form, and the various selections rendered by him were thoroughly appreciated. The recital opened with Smart's "Overture in D," a composition worthy of the great English composer. The overture was given in masterly style, and elicited warm applause, even at that early stage of the evening's performance. A "Pastorale" by Kullak was also much admired, while Bach's fine Toccata and Fugue in D proved, from an artistic point of view, one of the most successful during the evening. Guilmant's "Marche Funébre et Chant Séraphique" (played for the first time at these recitals), however, carried off the palm, and, appealing to the popular tastes, appeared to be admirably suited to the audience, and proved so attractive that its repetition was redemanded. Mr. King did not grant the encore, but, proceeding with his recital, gave Mozart's Larghetto from Clarinet Quintet. The following number—Guilmant's Fantasia on two English airs ("Home, sweet home," and "Rule Britannia")—which Mr. King has given with such marked success at previous recitals, was also well received. A most successful recital concluded with Lemmen's Marche Triomphale; the brilliant composition being finely rendered. The organist, who was heartily applauded, will be followed at the next recital by Mr. F. J. Sawyer, Mus.Bac.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

JAN. 17.

Rumours regarding the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society are various, and, it is to be presumed, cannot be relied upon.

A report that Mr. Hallé is to be appointed to the vacant post is going about; another, that Mr. Karl Meyder is to receive the coveted appointment. It is to be earnestly hoped that the Committee will not blunder over the matter this time.

Talking of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, just reminds me that Mr. George Hirst, who was at one time the organist to this society, has just died at Silverdale. He was a man of great musical talent, and while in Liverpool he was much esteemed and looked up to as a member of the musical profession. He gave up music and went into partnership with his brother as a woollen manufacturer; it was a better paying concern, I suppose. The deceased was also for some years organist at Great George Street Chapel, and was at one time, also, music-master at the School for the Blind.

The English opera season at the Royal Court Theatre runs merrily along, and is one of the most successful seasons Mr. Carl Rosa has had in this city. "Mignon" and the "Bohemian Girl" are the greatest draws. The first-named opera was given once last week, and is set down for two performances this. Mdme. Marie Roze assumes the title part, and is very successful. This artist also appeared in Verdi's "Il Trovatore," given on Saturday evening last, and was warmly received by an audience which filled the theatre. Miss Yorke's Azucena deserves particular mention, the delineation of the character being a veritable triumph.

"Colomba," by A. C. Mackenzie, and "Esmeralda," by Goring Thomas, are in rehearsal for the London season. Mr. Mackenzie's opera is very difficult, and, it is thought, not sufficiently melodious to become popular; while, on the other hand, Mr. Thomas's work is very melodious, and at the same time musicianly.

At Mr. Hallé's orchestral concert, given last evening, the chief items were:—Beethoven's triple Concerto for piano, violin, and violoncello, Raff's "Leonore" Symphony, Gade's "Hamlet" Overture, Mendelssohn's Tema con Variazioni, in D, for piano and violoncello. The performers were Mr. Hallé, Signor Piatti, and Mdme. Norman-Néruda.

There is a rumour that the Cathedral choir is in a very weak state as regards its existence, and that, but for the members of the Chapter coming forward and offering to defray the expenses during the current year, the pro-Cathedral would have been minus a choir. Heretofore, it seems, the rector has borne the expense, and that, so far, the bishop has given no encouragement to the choir which daily renders the musical part of the service in the establishment over which he presides.

Mr. John Hodgson begins on Saturday afternoon next, the 20th inst., a series of monthly organ recitals on the organ in St. Anne's Church, Aigburth, where he holds the position of organist and choirmaster. The programme of the first recital will be found in the organ news columns. Mr. Hodgson is known as an organist of great ability, and his performance on the St. George's Hall organ, while Mr. Best was absent from his post, was one the most successful of the series.

The supposed communication anent the Royal College from Mr. Gladstone would appear to have originated in somebody having indulged in a spasm of acute humour in the columns of our new and spirited contemporary the Musical Review. Says that paper:—"Mr. Gladstone's communication, published in our last, seems to have made quite a little sensation in the musical world, and not in the musical world alone. We have received numbers of inquiries as to the person to whom the letter—or rather the post-card had been addressed, and regarding the intentions of Government in connection with the Royal College. These persons we must refer to the heading, 'What might be, or should be,' under which the letter appeared. If they had observed that heading all their wonderment would have dissolved itself into thin Utopian air. But who now-a-days takes the trouble to read his newspaper carefully?"

THE LATE JOHN CROWDY.

THE cause of the Art, especially as regards the department of Church music, has lost by the sudden death on the 12th of Mr. JOHN CROWDY a notable champion. No writer on musical topics in our day has evidenced greater power and fervour than was displayed by this gifted and highly cultivated litterateur and dilettante. Widely as his labours in the cause of the arts have been recognised, in many directions his influence has been felt almost unconsciously, for he had much of power and interest to say conversationally; his valuable, tersely expressed thoughts, practical observations, and sound advice on musical and literary topics were freely, kindly, and modestly tendered to those who enjoyed the privilege of being fellow-workers with him in the interests of art, and to those who had also the advantage of his personal friendship. It may have been felt by some that the very earnestness of his views on art matters gave now and then to his advocacy of high art principles something of the flavour of Utopianism. Again, it was possible that his power of concentration on a given subject or department, artistic or literary, imparted at times a slightly crotchety aspect to his writings. But, how rare are the splendid qualities, earnestness of purpose and intense power of concentration upon which such hyper-criticism was really based! JOHN CROWDY'S earnestness arose from a love of art, which was indeed a passion, admitting no thoughts of self-interest or temporary disloyalty; he gazed, indeed, so earnestly into the azure sky of pure art, that he had little thought for the subordination of artistic power to the business interests of a world in which art is rather an angelic sojourner than a native inhabitant.

Digitized by Google

Then, of this earnestness came his remarkable power of thought and verbal concentration; indeed, his mastery over the English language was a rare characteristic in these days of rapid writing, slip-shod criticism, and hurried, negligent reading. So assiduously did this powerful critic and keen observer cultivate his mastery over our language, that he spent many years in transposing and re-planning the polished sentences of our English classics, notably those of ADDISON, a favourite model, in order that he might acquire that nervous, terse power of expression which became a technical characteristic of his literary labours. Mr. JOHN CROWDY—working at a period when music and the sister arts may be described as in a transition state, as escaping from some of the bonds of excessive artificiality and springing into a new and more earnest existence—exercised considerable influence in the cause of art; standing in the prudential position of firmly abiding in his faith in such of the canons of art as bear the seal of natural truth and express the experience of centuries of profound thought, yet at the same time he anxiously encouraged the development of all artistic impulses stamped by the earnestness of genius and the logical reasonableness of that common sense which characterises all true art. His protestations against pretentious, self-seeking empiricism, were as instant and earnest as were his ready, frank, acknowledgment of real merit, and his unflinching advocacy of those artistic manifestations his instincts and training convinced him were good and true. Like so many of our literary men and journalists, Mr. CROWDY was in the National service, his department being that of the Admiralty, where he enjoyed the companionable friendship of another earnest and able worker in the domains of art and literature, Mr. CHARLES MACKESON. Mr. CROWDY was for many years engaged upon the Guardian, as sub-editor, if I remember rightly, the well-recognised musical critic, Mr. C. A. BARRY, being a fellow-worker with him.

As editor of the Choirmaster, afterwards the Musician, Mr. CROWDY laboured conscientiously for the art, and he aided the late RICHARD LIMPUS by his writings and personal influence in the establishment of the College of Organists. For some years, from 1872 to 1876, Mr. JOHN CROWDY was the able and esteemed editor of the Musical Standard, contributing to these columns many of his most thoughtful and earnest articles and criticisms.

Mr. T. L. SOUTHGATE, his much esteemed collaborateur, and for some time the able editor of this paper, writes thus:—"The deceased gentleman has "been connected with the Musical Standard from the "date of its birth. Indeed, he, in company with its "first editor and proprietor, the late Mr. J. W. HAM-"MOND, and two well-known musicians still working "amongst us, assisted in planning the paper and "determining the independent policy which has been "its characteristic. Mr. CROWDY's philological at-"tainments, and the journalistic experience he "brought to bear on the paper were of no small "value. An important series of articles, 'On the "Musical Illustration of the Church Services,' which "he wrote upwards of twenty years ago, showed "that he possessed a reflective and cultured mind, and "were the means of eliciting many valuable opinions "on worship-music by some of our foremost "English musicians of the period. From time to "time Mr. CROWDY contributed many valuable articles "on various matters connected with music. All "who knew him can bear testimony to the unflagging "devotion towards his duties that he exhibited. No "amount of work that was thrown upon him seemed "to daunt him, and the watchful attention he "bestowed on every event affecting the art rendered "the journal under his editorship a complete "conspectus of all that a musician should know. "Although Mr. CROWDY's health, never robust, "began to give way under the strain of his literary "duties, he retained his interest in musical events "and frequently favoured us with his views on various "matters ripe for comment. A series of exhaustive "articles which he wrote on the 'Wagner theory,' "were remarkable for the painstaking care and critical "ability exhibited in the examination of this question "from a practical point of view. His writings were "always marked by much freshness of thought, inde-"pendence of tone, fairness of judgment, and force of "diction. It was hoped that the fresh country air, and "comparative freedom from the toilsome duties of a "literary life, would bring such health as would enable "him to do valuable work for many a year to come; "but it has been ordered otherwise. His death will "be mourned by a wide circle of friends, and by none "more than those connected with this journal, of "which he was so able a supporter."

The proprietors and many readers of this paper duly remembering his services and consistent advocacy of the art within these pages, will, I know, join with his many friends in lamenting his loss. For many years Mr. CROWDY suffered from delicate health. At the termination of his period of service at the Admiralty, he retired to a pleasant country house which he built for himself (at Fair Oaks, Addlestone, Surrey), his connection with the art-world being preserved by one direct link, the editorship of the Artist, wherein he served with characteristic earnestness the painter's art, bringing to his task sympathetic thoughtfulness, a wide knowledge of artistic topics, and his epigrammatic mastery over the English language. Among his notable contributions to the verbal literature of music were his poetic and masterly analytical programmes of Handel's "Messiah," and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," written for concert use and well deserving the honour of being constantly attached preface-fashion to those musical masterpieces. Although possessed of considerable technical knowledge of the art of composition, Mr. CROWDY did not write much music or set himself up as an executant beyond his home circle. He entertained, indeed, such high standards of artistic excellence as precluded such thoughts of pretension as incline less wise people to parade their incomplete accomplishments. He will be remembered for his noteworthy efforts to secure the simplification and reformation of the Anglican Chant in his invention of Free Chant by which the Canticles and Psalms could be enunciated in simple, natural, unfettered song. Herein the inventor displayed an instinctive recognition of the foundation of good chanting upon the principles which govern speech and a far-sighted knowledge of the angular character of our language with its obstinate fixity of accent, moving on the whole unsatisfactorily with the elastic flow of genuine Plain Chant as the best medium for the conveyance of the plastic words of the Latin language. In this direction Mr. CROWDY gained the adhesion of such thoughtful artists as Mr. JOHN C. WARD, and the approval of many such earnest Churchmen and intelligent non-professional lovers of music as his faithful friend Dr. E. T. WATKINS. The Free Chant is an undoubted fact in the history of the modern revival of ecclesiastical music. It may be that its adoption upon the lines of its inventor will not be fully realised, but it will remain as one of the engines by which the standard of good musical recitation is destined to be reformed and advanced. The indulgent reader will permit me to here record my own indebtedness to the late eminent critic. Seeing my first essays with the pen, he sought me out, and with characteristic kindness became at once my teacher, guide, and friend. His indifferent health and love of retirement had latterly led him away from the crowded scenes of a public life. The sacred ground of a pure, gentle, loving domestic life, and the irreparable loss his widow and children have sustained in his untimely death, at the early age of forty-eight, are subjects not to be encroached upon. In the quiet country he rests, where the birds will carol their MAKER'S praise in cadences as true and simple as his own Free Chant. His memory will be long cherished by loving friends and his works will still live on. Requiescat in pace.

The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin has given a gold medal to Sarasate the violinist.

Dvorak's opera, "Der Bauerein Schelm," has been given successfully in Hamburg.

"The Poor Student" is the name of a new operetta by a Viennese composer, Herr Millöcker.

Signor Belluci has written an opera on the story of "Charlotte Corday."

A new opera is to be given at Frankfort, called "Alona," and composed by an artist bearing the decidedly English name of William Hill.

Mr. Villiers Stanford has finished an opera in three acts and a prologue, having for its story the life of Savonarola. Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett is the writer of the libretto.

It is satisfactory to hear of the improvement in Hans von Bulow's health. He has been able to conduct several orchestral rehearsals, and is announced to play Raff's Pianoforte Concerto in Meiningen, on the 23rd inst.

It is said that a new opera, written in the Roumanian language, and composed by Oreste Bimboni, will shortly be produced at Bucharest. The Government is evidently anxious to promote native art, since it has itself engaged the chorus and orchestra.

Meritorious, rather than great, is the verdict pronounced upon a new orchestral symphony in E (No. 3), by Max Bruch, which was played in New York on December 16th, at a concert of the Symphony Society, to which body it is dedicated.

One of the oldest musical journals ceased to exist in the latter end of 1882, the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, which was founded in 1798, by Breitkopf and Härtel, but afterwards was published by Rieter-Biedermann from 1848. The last editor was Herr Chrysander.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

During the proceedings at a meeting of convocation of the University of London, held on the 16th, at the University Building, Burlington Gardens, Dr. Storrar, the chairman, presiding, Mr. M. P. Christie, B.A., moved, "That the Senate be requested to propose terms upon which graduates in music shall be admitted to Convocation." He said he could only account for the present condition of things in regard to music by supposing that when the charter was granted, it was not foreseen that music would take the high place which it had done. The examination for the degree in music was of a very high character indeed, and required as much varied and special information as any of the other examinations. Mr. Hennell, B.A., seconded the motion, which was carried nem. con.

This step is one it is gratifying to chronicle, as evidencing the advancing claims of music and musicians to proper recognition, and as showing a desire on the part of the University authorities to duly respect the holders of their own musical degrees.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

At the Examinations of January 9th, 10th, and 11th, the following gentlemen obtained the diploma of Associateship:—R. C. Banks, Rochdale; F. N. Baxter, Tetbury; Rowland Briant, London; T. Cox, Wolverhampton; Michael Fairs, South Shields; Sidney Hall, Stalybridge; A. Hann, Ilminster; H. H. Hoyle, Queensbury, Bradford; W. Jones, Woodville, Burton-on-Trent; E. H. Lemare, Ventnor; O. A. Mansfield, Warminster; J. H. Olding, London; R. Yates Mander, Leamington; C. E. Melville, Leeds; H. W. Richards, London; C. W. Moss, Ipswich; G. J. Robertson, North Tawton; S. Round, Tipton; C. H. H. Tippel, Reading; P. A. Strickland, Leeds; F. W. Sykes, Selby; R. F. Tyler, Woolwich; J. W. Wallis, London; J. E. W. West, London; and H. Davan Whetton, London. The following gentlemen having previously obtained Associateship, secured the diploma of Fellowship:—F. N. Abernethy, London; F. J. Harper, Hull; Henry Hudson, Southport; and Hamilton Robertson, London. The examiners were C. J. Frost, Mus.Doc.; Henry Gadsby; Jas. Higgs, Mus. Bac.; E. J. Hopkins, Mus.Doc.; E. H. Turpin, and Thomas Wingham. The examinations were attended by a very large number of candidates. A most gratifying feature was the marked advance in the artistic character of the work done. With regard to the organ playing, the pieces (almost entirely selected from Bach and Mendelssohn's organ works) were mostly rendered in excellent style and with great finish. Still more noticeable was the admirable judgment and good solid technicalities shown in the performance of the church playing tests. In the paper work tests a corresponding improvement was observable, many musicianly examples of counterpoint, orchestration, etc., coming before the examiners' notice. It is, indeed, a simple fact that the work done by the College of Organists during the past few years has made a distinctly appreciable mark upon the high and noble profession of the organist in this country. It is to be earnestly hoped that this good work will be carried forward with the same good results from year, to year to the more complete training of its followers, and to the ultimate elevation to its true place in our social strata of one of the highest executive branches of the art.

Mr. Stephen S. Stratton, of Birmingham, writes thus to the Musical Review: "Dr. Filippi's interesting account of 'A visit to Wagner' reminds me of a note I made while indexing Harmonicon. In the last volume there is a brief notice of music in Leipzig; and mention is made of the performance of a 'symphony by Richard Wagner, scarcely twenty years of age, which was much and deservedly applauded.' The recently published Statistik der Concerte im Saale des Gewandhauses zu Leipsig gives the date of the performance as January 10th, 1833. It also mentions an overture, performed February 23rd, 1832."

Though not immediately concerning the "sons of harmony," who are usually wise enough to have little occasion for speaking in the Law Courts, and who are not likely to be called upon practically to "sooth the savage breasts" of those who delight to "bark and bite," it is not out of place to record in these columns the reported failure of the palatial rooms of the New Palace of Justice, from the acoustical point of sight. When will our architects pay that attention, which is emphatically demanded, to the question of securing certain and satisfactory acoustical results? Surely the matter is important enough, seeing that every building and room must necessarily be constructed for uses employing the sense of hearing. Our musical bodies would do well to advance in this matter by opening an investigation as to the best principles upon which to build a model concert-room.

Passing Events.

Herr Pachmann has left London for the continent, playing at Paris for M. Pasdeloup before going to St. Petersburg.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson hold a sale on Tuesday next, when a good collection of valuable string and wind instruments, etc., will be offered for purchase.

Gounod's "Redemption," it is said, will take the place of Bach's Passion Music ("St. John") at St. Anne's, Soho, and will be conducted by Mr. Barnby. The work will most probably be given in two parts, to be sung alternately on Friday evenings at eight.

A very excellent concert was given at Littleport, near Ely, by Dr. Chipp (organist of Ely Cathedral), and several ladies and gentlemen. Weber's "Preciosa" was exceedingly well rendered, and was followed by a very attractive selection.

Messrs. J. Cowley & Co., of Hull, are supplying direct from America several models of the American reed organ, exhibiting very high perfection as regards tone and a finished mechanism. The largest-sized instrument is effective in churches and school-rooms of good size.

The Dundee Festival of the 24th, 25th, and 26th inst., under conductorship of H. M. Henry Nägel, will include performances of Gounod's "Redemption," and orchestral concert with Beethoven's Choral Symphony (this one concert being under the direction of Mr. Manns), and Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

Mr. R. S. Burton gave a performance of Berlioz's "Faust" in the Leeds Town Hall, last week. The principals were Miss Davies, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Thornton Wood. The chorus was supplied by the Bradford Choral Society. Mr. J. T. Carrodus was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Burton was conductor.

The Graphic judiciously points out that something more might be done for vocal music at the Monday Popular Concerts. Nothing, indeed, could be more acceptable than the systematic performance of the delicious lyrics of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Bennett, Gounod, H. Smart, etc.

"Don Eugenio" is the title of a comic opera by Herr Mohr, which was produced at Berlin, on December 30th.

Gounod's "Faust" has been heard in St. Petersburg in the Russian language; and the same composer's "Redemption" will be performed for the first time on the continent at Brussels, in April.

Amongst the recent subscriptions in aid of the Fund for the Royal College of Music is a subscription for £5,000 from Mr. Andrew Carnegie, of New York, a native of Dunfermline (N.B.). The subscription list at Newcastle-on-Tyne is gaining strength, £400 has already been obtained, Sir William Armstrong heading the list with £100.

It is gratifying to learn that Mr. Williams, the new and esteemed organist of Gloucester Cathedral, has proved himself to be an able conductor at a recent performance given in that city, when Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was given. The news has special significance in view of Three Choir Festival Meetings held from time to time in Gloucester.

The Bloomsbury Church Choir Union is the title of a new association formed by the choirs of that important section of mid-London. The objects of the society are the cultivation and development of high-class church music, and the careful, earnest endeavour to secure the fitting and devotional rendering of service music in all its departments. The combined choirs meet in the different churches by turns, and propose to hold a choral festival each year, between Easter and Whitsuntide. The local clergy are the society's vice-presidents, and a strong committee of management has been formed, consisting of the different church organists and representatives from the various choirs forming the "Union." Mr. C. H. Mason, of Broad Street, W. C., is the hon. secretary of the association. Such a society deserves earnest sympathy and support, for the proposal to zealously cultivate the proper and artistic rendering of the best church music is surely one of the highest stand-points any musical body can claim as the object of its existence.

BY FRANCIS EDWARD GLADSTONE, MUS.DOC.

Now this chord has two notes in common with each of the others; nevertheless, when the 1st chord and the 3rd are played in succession, the transition sounds abrupt; whereas, if the third is preceded by the 2nd the effect is excellent. The reason for this apparent inconsistency is, like so many other difficulties, explained by Helmholtz. In passing from the chord of G major to that of E minor, we retain in the second chord the characteristic interval (viz., the major 3rd G; B) of the former; but, in passing from the chord of C major to that of E minor, although we retain the two notes common to both chords, these notes are characteristic, not of the first but of the second, and thus the change of harmony is more forced and sudden. But if we combine the 3rd, 6th, and octave of our scale of C major, placing another A below them as a bass, we obtain a minor chord, standing in the same relationship to the chord of C major that E minor occupies towards G major; moreover, these two minor chords are connected in precisely the same way as are the major chords, i.e., the 5th of one is the root of the other.

Proceeding as we did in the formation of the major scale let us place these two chords in juxtaposition:

Ex. 11. A.

This of course only gives us an incomplete scale. We will however place the notes in regular order within the compass of an octave, adding the upper E:—

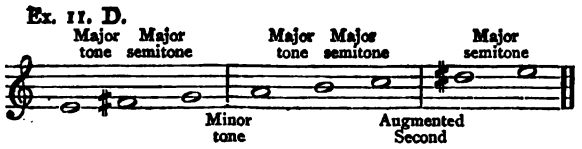
Ex. 11. B.

Dividing these notes into sections similar to those of the major scale, we find that only the middle section is complete. However, the interval from E to G in the first section corresponds exactly with the interval from A to C in the second; and it is only necessary to add F ♯, a major tone above E, to make the resemblance perfect:—

Ex. 11. C.

Here we are confronted with a difficulty. If D ♮ be borrowed from the scale of C major, although this will produce the earliest known form of the minor scale, the effect, to modern ears trained to appreciate the sensitive character of the leading note, will seem inconclusive and therefore unsatisfactory. If however we now continue our system of scale formation from three triads and place F ♯ above B, it will be found that these two notes form the interval of a perfect 5th (F ♯ being a major tone above E, and E a perfect 5th below B); and it only remains to add D♯, a major 3rd above B, to complete the dominant triad, and with it our modern minor scale:—

Ex. 11. D.



It will be seen that there is a close analogy between this scale and the major scale already formed; but there is a marked difference in regard to the intervals which separate the first group of three notes from the second group, and the second section from the third. This gives a somewhat uncouth effect to the ascending octave; and therefore it is (as we know) usual to lessen this roughness, in passages of melody, by sharpening the 6th degree in ascending, and to lower the 7th degree in descending the scale. It is interesting to observe that there is here, again, some correspondence between our artificial scale and the scale of nature.

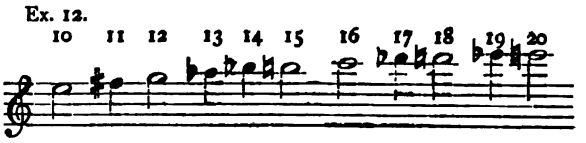
The series of harmonics rising from includes, between the 10th and 20th, the following sounds:—

Ex. 12.

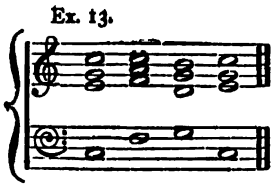


The 11th is of course too flat for our scale; but if the 15th, 16th, 18th, and 20th harmonics are taken in succession, beginning with the highest, they agree well with the intervals of our descending melodic minor scale, and if the 15th, 17th, 19th, and 20th could be heard in ascending order they would be found to be, not (it is true) in perfect tune with the true C ♯ and D ♯ of the chromatic scale of C, but as nearly as possible (short of exactness) in tune with the scale of equal temperament. This fact, although of less consequence than others which we have been considering, seems to me not without its significance, especially when it is remembered that the exact intonation of chromatic intervals in melody is a matter of smaller importance than that of diatonic intervals.

Returning now to the major scale, we shall be in a position to make an examination of the relationship or otherwise existing between the various triads which may be formed from it.

We have found that the most natural progression in harmony is from "tonic" to "dominant" and back again, and that if we move from the "tonic" chord to that of the "subdominant," the return vid the dominant is grateful:—

Ex. 13.



Supposing, however, that we desire more variety than can be obtained from the employment of major chords only, we may bring into use one of the minor chords which have helped us in forming the minor scale. It has been already shown that a minor chord based upon the sixth degree of the major scale follows the tonic harmony very agreeably, because both chords contain the characteristic interval of a major 3rd from the tonic root. But a minor chord is, for similar reasons, satisfactorily followed by the major chord situated a 3rd below it, inasmuch as the two higher sounds of the major triad are identical with the two characteristic sounds of the minor triad. We may therefore interpolate a chord of A minor between the first and second chords in the progression just quoted:—

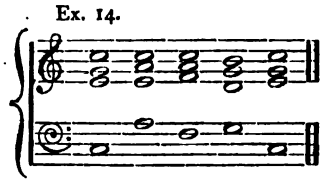
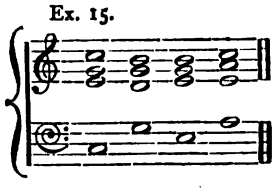
Ex. 14.



and the result will still be good. If, however, we begin by a movement from the tonic to the dominant chord, we may take a wider excursion. Let the progression from the chord of C be followed by another from G major to E minor, and this again by a third step from E minor to A minor, the roots ascending a fourth :—

Ex. 15.



It is only necessary to add chords 3, 4, and 5 from our last example to produce a good result.

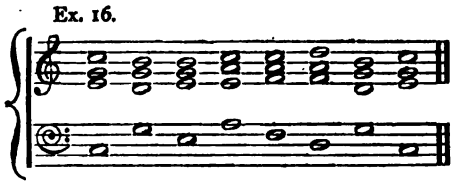
Five out of the seven triads which may be formed from the scale of C have thus been brought into use. But there is another upon the second of the scale (D) which now claims our consideration. At first sight this is as good a minor chord as that on A or E. A moment's thought will however shew us that this is not so. Remembering that the interval from C to D is a major tone, while that from G to A is a minor tone, we find that the interval from D to A is flatter than a perfect 5th, and, as a minor 3rd is equal to the sum of a major tone and a major semitone, the interval from D to F must be less than a minor 3rd. It follows that the triad on D in the scale of C major is not a concord at all. It is in fact a portion of the chord of the dominant 9th, both F and A being discords. Students of harmony will however remember that the absence of the root of a discord often relaxes the rules for the resolution of the dissonant note or notes, and if the triad under notice be followed by dominant harmony, the parts progressing each to the nearest available note, the progression is quite satisfactory. We may therefore add this chord on D to the series of triads already produced :—

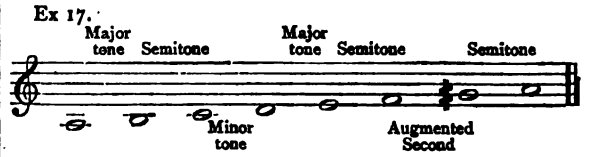
Ex. 16.



It is worth while to observe moreover that the 9th (A) is here regularly resolved, and that although the 7th (F) falls to D, in the first instance, it afterwards rises to E, the note of its ordinary resolution.

It will be well, before considering other combinations of chords in a major key to compare those already noticed with similar progressions in a minor key; and this comparison will be more readily made by transposing the scale already formed. Taking A as the tonic, the scale will stand thus :—

Ex 17.



At first sight, the six lowest notes correspond to a portion of the scale of C major; but there is one important difference, viz., that the note D now stands at the interval of a perfect 5th below A, and therefore also a true minor 3rd below F. This of course displaces the order of major and minor tones. The significance of these changes will presently appear.

I may here be charged with inconsistency. It will perhaps be said that as the scale of E minor has been compared to a portion of the harmonic series of C, and inasmuch as the chord of E minor has actually been derived from that source, I ought, logically, to contend that E minor is the true relative minor key to C. I venture to point out, however, that most authorities agree in regarding the dominant chord as a second derivative of the tonic root although, taken as the basis of a scale, this chord would produce sounds foreign to the original scale; and that in going a step further and looking at the minor chord as a third derivative from the original root, I am only following out the same principle. There is an obvious relationship between the scales of G major and E minor, arising from the fact that the three last notes of one are identical with the three first notes of the other, and the close relationship existing between the chords has been already shewn.

The idea which I wish to suggest is that the chords of C major, G major, and E minor are all the direct offspring of the parent C, but that the two latter belong to a later generation than the former; they are, as it were grandchildren (brother and sister) and thus their relationship towards C is of a different kind to their relationship towards one another.

I have only to add that the chords of C major and A minor have of course a parallel connection.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Mr. Barnby, on the evening of January 17th, gave a fine performance of "The Creation," at the Albert Hall. Haydn's great oratorio, which, he said, had occupied him a long time, because he intended the work to last a long time, may be classed, for its perennial reputation with "The Messiah" and "Elijah;" although, certainly not quite so often brought before the public. Mr. Charles Hallé chose the oratorio for the first musical festival of Bristol, held in October, 1873, and the Sacred Harmonic Society represented it from time to time.

The vocal "principals," on January 17th, were Mdme. Marie Roze, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Santley—a goodly triad of fine and accomplished artists. Mdme. Roze excelled in the air, "With verdure clad," where ascent is made by a run to the high B flat, and the air (with chorus) "The marvellous work" was also a feature. Mr. Maas made the most of the tenor song, "In native worth," and Mr. Santley rendered some service in the duets of Part II. His most successful solos were, "Rolling in foaming billows," and he read the recitatives effectively. It may be thought odd that Haydn has made Adam, who here appears as a married lover, a basso (or baritone) instead of a tenor. The choruses went well, especially the glorious one in C, "The heavens are telling." Mr. Barnby held the bâton, and Dr. Stainer was organist. "The Messiah" is down for Ash Wednesday (February 7th).

Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. Straus, and Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

The first number on the above (last Saturday's) programme was heard for the eighteenth, and the closing trio for the twenty-fourth, time at these concerts. Though no fault could reasonably be found with so admirable a selection, it is possible that a few enterprising spirits among the audience may occasionally sigh for a little change of diet. Rheinberger, Svendsen, Sgambati, and others might be allowed one hearing during the season, and it would have been a graceful act to have devoted one programme to the honour and memory of Joachim Raff. It is scarcely to be wished that these Popular Concerts should degenerate into "Ancient" ones; for though it may not be their province to introduce new and untried works, there are many glorious compositions that are neither absolute novelties, nor second-rate productions of first-rate men heard for the twenty-fourth time at these concerts exclusively, and the hundred and twenty-fourth all other concerts inclusively.

Mdme. Norman-Néruda was warmly welcomed back, and how delightfully she led the quartet, especially the noble adagio, will be imagined by all those who are acquainted with her playing and Mendelssohn's work. Herr Straus fills a secondary place as admirably as he leads—we do not look upon his like every day.

If Mr. Charles Hallé has a particular favour for any composer, that composer is Schubert. He played the No. 4 Impromptu with a piquancy and grace that could not be equalled by any other pianist. Mr. Hallé has the true expression for Schubert.

Bach's sonata is a perfect example of pleasing and tuneful music in strictly scientific form.

Mr. Lloyd made the most of Signor Piatti's commonplace production, the second part of which seems to have no connection with the first. His rendering of "Adelaide" is well known. Mr. Zerbini evidently took much pains with his accompaniments, and the result, it is pleasant to be able to record, was entirely satisfactory.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The concert of last Monday evening was attended by the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Miss Thudichum.
Quartet in B flat, Op. 64, No. 5, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Haydn.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

Brahms's trio, a very recent production, took the place of the customary string quartet. A first hearing disposes the attentive auditor to admire the work—discursive, if not *ex*cursive, like all this master's compositions, but not "without form, or void." The trio comprises four movements: an allegro in C, an andante con moto in A minor, a presto (scherzo) in C minor, and a (final) allegro giocoso in the original key. The opening movement, which includes a "free Fantasia," various "tributaries," many reminiscences, and the usual show-off bits of contrapuntal writing, struck me, in spite of its length, as genial and interesting music. The andante, a national air with those always trying "variations," here very cleverly treated, has a pianoforte accompaniment of full chords in syncopation; and one of the (five) varieties is a duologue for the string instruments. The scherzo, which follows in another minor key (rather a mistake in point of form), has the form of a spiritual presto, in semi-quavers, 6-8 time, quaint, but not very new, because reminding one of the used-up "Hungarian" style. The finale struck one as more remarkable for the ingenious use of the pianoforte, here well brought out, and the working up treatment than for any original ideas. Of course the trio will soon be heard again; assuredly at one of Mr. C. Hallé's spring recitals.

Mr. Hallé played his difficult part so as to evolve all the fine features of the work. His refined reading of Beethoven's lovely little Sonata in F sharp major, composed in 1809, is well known. Ten minutes suffice for the performance. A long interval of prolific productivity elapsed between this sonata and the famous "Op. 57" in F major. Some musicians opine that the working out of the second movement of Op. 78 (also in F sharp) savours a little of the "piece-writing," or "passage-writing" style. The signature of the sonata and the necessary use of double sharps in the modulations (as to C sharp major) deter many amateurs from attempting to play it, and the world is not a loser!

The duet sonata in G (at the head of Part II), last of the set, is recognised as a chef d'œuvre. The earlier sonata in the same key is one of the "Emperor Alexander" triad employed a few weeks ago, with Herr Pachmann as pianist. Mr. Hallé executed his task with exactness, and seemed to breathe out his soul in the cadences, especially in the last of all. Mdme. Norman-Néruda, here an able "second," shone afterwards brilliantly as "first fiddle," in Haydn's 41st quartet, thought to be his finest—a great deal to say!

Miss Thudichum's voice has much flexibility and an extensive compass.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remained until the end.

Duet, "When the wind bloweth in from the sea".. Hy. Smart.
Part-song, "New Year's Song" ..... Berthold Tours.

The vocalists were Mrs. A. Broughton and Mr. F. King. Mr. James Broughton was conductor, and Mr. Alfred Broughton accompanied at the piano.

It is not often that pantomime music is worthy of notice in these columns, but an exception may be made in favour of the pantomime "Robinson Crusoe," now running at the Grand Theatre here. Miss Fanny Leslie deserves special praise for her charming rendering of the patriotic song "Run up the flag," specially written for her by Mr. Clement Scott, and this lady is also very successful in the pretty "Dreaming Song."

Dr. Spark's organ recitals have been resumed, and visitors to Leeds might do worse than look in at the Leeds Town Hall some Tuesday afternoon, when they will have the opportunity of hearing one of the finest organs in the kingdom. A special feature of the Tuesday's performance was Sullivan's song "The Lost Chord" specially arranged for the organ by Dr. Spark. The programme also included Dr. Spark's "Morceau pour les Carillons" F Major, and the "Toy Symphony" (Romberg), and one of the organ concertos as adapted, and one may say adopted, by J. S. Bach.

MR. VAN. NOORDEN'S CONCERTS.

Mr. P. E. Van. Noorden held his second concert at the Ladbroke Hall, on the evening of Thursday, January 18th. The room was crowded to the lobbies. The able entrepreneur himself did not play at all, but his son Mr. Walter Van Noorden, distinguished himself as pianist, in his father's spirited "Polka de Concert," and also in the splendid duet for two pianofortes, written by M. Saint-Säens, of Paris, on the theme of the trio (Scherzo) from Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in E flat "Op. 31." Mr. Lindsay Sloper was W. Van Noorden's able collaborateur, and the piece evoked loud applause. Miss Reba, a pupil of Mr. Van Noorden, sang "L'Alba" (by Signor Rotoli) with éclat, also Roeckel's "Of course." Mr. A. Thomas won a bis for a new song, "The Skipper's Flag," and Molloy's "Three merry men." Mdme. Julie Pelletier evoked much applause for Mr. Randegger's song, "Only for me," and she also took part in concerted pieces. A farce called "Chiselling" was afterwards performed under the direction of Mr. H. Murray Lane.

CITY OF LONDON CHORAL UNION.

There has been much controversy of late among a certain class of people (who imagine that they would not be fulfilling the duties of life without endeavouring to make themselves obnoxious by trying to find fault in the well-doing of their fellow men) as to the advisability or necessity of giving entertainment of a high order to inmates of our hospitals, workhouses, infirmaries, &c., and, indeed, they have gone so far as to try to advance a question as to the legality of such an admirable undertaking.

At the concert of which I am about to speak there were between 700 and 800 inmates present; and to see the beam of delight which showed itself conspicuously on the faces of these poor old people, as one by one the artists stepped upon the platform, must have at once crushed any contrary feeling, if the person or persons beholding such a pleasing sight had any heart or sympathy, however small. It has also been urged that the inmates of workhouses are, as a rule, not able to appreciate good music; but this opinion must be taken for what it is worth, and, from my experience, I am vain enough to say that it is worth but little. If those persons who have advanced such an uncharitable rebuke could have been present at the concert given to the inmates of the City of London Union, on Thursday, the 18th inst., I feel sure they must have altered their opinion. Besides this we must remember who inhabit our workhouses, and also that they were founded for the express purpose of sheltering the old age of those who have known brighter and better days, but through adverse circumstances have come down in the world. So it is not fair to say because they are poor and dependent upon charity now, that they always were so, nor is it charitable to say that in their brighter days they had not opportunities of hearing good music as much as ourselves. Should we not take a delight in giving pleasure, however little, to these old people? We should try to think what a monotonous life they pass as day by day they go through the workhouse routine of duty, and what pleasure it must afford them, not only to be present during these concerts, but to think that they are not forgotten by us who are fortunate enough to be "outside." Remember that they are human as ourselves, and to give them any entertainment or recreation by which their position may for a time be set aside, demands in humanity's name, that the quibbles of law, and party feeling should for once be passed over.

The concert was a complete success, the principal artists being Mdme. Cave Ashton, Misses Browning and Ryan, Messrs. H. Milward, Alfred Kenningham and Alfred Moore. There was a most efficient band and chorus under the able conductorship of Mr. R. J. Pitt, in whose hands was the entire management of the concert. Besides the above-named artists, Mr. John Jefferys presided at the organ, and Mr. Geo. F. Grover at the piano. The honours for vocal solos fell to Mdme. Ashton, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Moore; while Mr. John Jeffrys, for his organ solo, Mr. Arthur Payne, and Mr. Elphick, violin solos, and Mr. H. W. Hollis, for his flute solo, must each be congratulated for displaying great skill on their respective instruments. I learn that the expense of the concert was kindly borne by Mr. Alfred Lyon, who, in an admirable speech, clearly proved that he had but the interest of the inmates at heart.

GEO. F. GROVER.

CORK.

On the 16th inst. the Chevalier Antoine de Kontski gave the first of a series (to consist of three) of piano recitals at the Opera House. Here is the programme, all played from memory:—

PART I.

Adagio and Finale (Manuscript), from Sonata.....	Weber.
"Spring," "Serenade," "The Hunter" (Lieder ohne Worte)	Mendelssohn.
Concert Fantasia upon "Faust".....	Kontski.

"The Awakening of the Lions" (Caprice Heroic)..	Kontski.
Nocturne	Döhler.
"Invitation à la Valse".....	Weber.
Mazurka.....	Chopin.
Scherzo de la Seconde Symphonie	Kontski.

His playing was characterised by great brilliancy of execution, particularly shown in his rendering of Chopin's mazurka. He was very well received, and will no doubt have a full house to-day at the second of his recitals.

F. ST. JOHN LACY.

GLASGOW.

The concerts of the Choral Union have been so far entirely successful. The number of subscribers and frequenters has not in any degree diminished, and the prevailing impression is that the present season will prove ultimately more successful than any former one. Complaints have appeared in the local papers anent the excessive amount of Wagnerian, or advanced music introduced into this season's programmes, and these have given rise to quite a controversy on the matter, other writers having appeared on the defensive side of the question. As a matter of fact, the programmes should be so selected as to give a moderate idea of what has been done in the way of composition by musicians of both the past and the present. The main purpose of the concerts, considered apart from their relation to a commercial speculation, is to give educational facilities to that portion of the Glasgow public which aspires to be considered musically inclined. To suit this section of the public it is indeed needful that the programmes be retrospective as well as progressive in character.

Notice of the various miscellaneous concerts, and the production of Gounod's "Redemption" is held over till next week.

WIMBLEDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This society, which is rapidly coming to the front rank of suburban societies, gave a capital performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie," on Wednesday, the 17th inst. The solos were well sung by Miss Alice Parry, Miss Whitehead (amateur), and Mrs. Dean, each of whom delivered their parts with great declamatory power, pure tone, and artistic style, the trio, "Hearts feel that love thee," being most enjoyable. The overture and "War March" were played with great spirit and precision, the latter being redemanded. The chorus sang as usual with crispness and good intonation, but once or twice the soprano seemed to lack decision in attack. On the whole, however, the performance was most creditable. The second part of the concert opened with Beethoven's "Prometheus" (overture), played well. Miss Alice Parry followed with "Nobil Signor," beautifully sung, in which she displayed a voice of good compass, quality, and great power, while her execution of the florid passages were remarkably good. Schubert's "Rosamunde" music was perhaps not quite as well rendered as the other items entrusted to the orchestra, a slight dragging being apparent in "Entr'acte, No. 2. "Oh, that we two were maying," was sung by Mrs. Dean in a manner that drew forth an enthusiastic encore. The part-songs, "Hunting Song" (Smart), and "Gipsy Life" (Schumann), although well sung, seemed to fall somewhat flat after the spirited choruses of "Athalie." The programme concluded with a new march, "Masonic," by Boucher, which made a marked and perhaps novel effect—novel in that it succeeded in keeping the whole of the audience seated until its close. The orchestra, a very efficient one, numbered some sixty instrumentalists, mostly residents, and the chorus about a hundred voices. Mr. Sumner, as usual, conducted. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given on February 21st.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

JAN. 23rd.

The Carl Rosa opera season terminated at the Royal Court Theatre, on Saturday evening, with a very fine performance of "Mignon." The four weeks' season has been the most successful, financially and artistically, that the company has ever had in this city, and regrets, both on the part of the members of the company, and on that of the general public, have been expressed that the season was not a longer one.

The performances of the various operas given have been more finished in little matters of detail than has been the case heretofore, and the staging of the works has been much more complete and better than have been the accessories in preceding representations given in Liverpool. This of course reflects credit upon the management of the theatre, but more particularly upon Mr. H. Brooklyn, Mr. Rosa's stage manager, to whose untiring exertions great praise is justly due. Of the artists, it is impossible not to sing their praises in language that may appear devoid of criticism, but it must be remembered that all have had long experience and have for some time been singing and acting in the same operas, thereby being able to pick out weak points and develop good ones at each recurring performance. In addition to this, rehearsals are always going on; and again, Mr. Rosa himself is always about, superintending and overlooking each representation.

Mdme. Marie Roze has much improved, and each character she has represented has been excellently pourtrayed. Miss Burns, as usual, has been brilliant; Miss Yorke irreproachable; Miss Perry is gaining strength in her voice, and more character in her acting.

Of the gentlemen, the two most conspicuous are of course Mr. Turner and Mr. Ludwig, both of whom have been in splendid trim during the whole of the engagement. Mr. M'Guckin's bearing on the stage is much easier than it was, and at times he sings very well, but there is occasionally a disagreeable nasal twang which detracts rather from his success.

Mr. Snazelle's "Mephistofeles" is now a very finished performance and worthy of mention. Mr. Pope has rendered good service in parts where his ponderous bass voice is in requisition. Mr. Harley, the new American tenor, has had no chance of shewing what he is made of, and Mr. Ben. Davis has not had anything great to do so far either. Both gentlemen have good voices and no doubt will be acquisitions.. Mr. John Pew has had the greater part of the conducting to do, and who could do it better?

Mr. Goosens has also gained warm approbation for the admirable manner in which he has piloted his forces when sitting at the conductor's desk. The splendid success of "Favorita" is in a great measure owing to his exertions.

The company return to Liverpool in September, when the two new operas "Colomba" and "Esmeralda" are promised. The Alexandra Theatre is to be the scene of their next visit.

The first of the third series of the Ladies' Classical Chamber Concerts took place in the saloon of the Liverpool Philharmonic Hall, on Saturday afternoon. There was a large and fashionable audience. The artists, who were all well-known, were Miss Dora Schirmacher, Messrs. Schiever, Harmer, Speelman, and Völlmar. The programme contained items by Beethoven, Haydn, Handel, Scarlatti, Rheinberger and Tartini.

To-night Benedict's "Graziella" is to be given by the Philharmonic Society, the composer conducting. Mdme. Marie Roze (who, by the way, seems to work excessively hard) is to sustain the title rôle, which was originally written for her.

Mr. Randegger is mentioned in connection with the soon to be vacant conductorship of this society.

J. J. M.

The following was accidentally omitted last week in the advertisement on the back page ("American Organs"): "We are now allowing 25 per cent. discount off our organs until further notice, so as to thoroughly introduce them into this country."

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

The most interesting concert of the new year has been that given by Mr. Stockley, in the Town Hall, on the 18th inst. (the third of the present series). The programme cannot be said, however, to present much novelty, nor, as will be seen, were the items very artistically arranged:—

Overture, "Athalie"	Mendelssohn.
Air, "Love in her eyes sits playing"	Handel.
Quartet, "The Austrian Hymn"	Haydn.
Song, "I rejoice in my youth"	Macfarren.
Symphony No. 4, "The Italian"	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3	Beethoven.
Air, "Walter's Prize Song" ("Meistersinger")	Wagner.
Aria and Rondo ("Sonnambula")	Bellini.
Suite No. 4, "Scènes Pittoresques"	Massenet.
Song, "The Garland"	Mendelssohn.
New sacred song, "Where the shadows never fall"	F. L. Moir.
Overture "Alfonso and Estrella"	Schubert.

The "Italian" symphony, the "Leonora" overture, and the rest of the orchestral pieces are familiar enough, by this time, to Birmingham concert-lovers. The band was not so satisfactory on this occasion as it generally is, one or two of the movements in the symphony being rather coarsely rendered; the grand Beethovian prelude, was, however, finely played. Massenet's very interesting set of pieces, was, if I remember rightly, first produced here by Mr. Stockley during his season of 1881-2, when the choice little works of the French composer made a distinct and most favourable impression. Tunefulness of theme with piquantly varied orchestration seem their chief characteristics. If it were not for the instrumental charm, the pieces themselves might seem a little too "spun-out," No. 3 of the suite especially.

The characteristic titles of the four movements are—(a) "Marche," (b) "Air de Ballet," (c) "Angelus," (d) "Fête Boheme." The slow movement with variations, "God preserve the Emperor," was the only one from Haydn's famous quartet played on this occasion; it was rendered by the entire body of strings. I do not make the objection to this sort of thing that some musical precisians do; it all depends upon whether you can get 40 players to execute the work with the same unanimity and delicacy as four. On this occasion no fault on this score could be found with the performance; the accord of the band was perfectly good. If this item did not excite very great interest it was because the place of its introduction was not better considered. Schubert's lively overture to the ill-fated opera "Alfonso and Estrella" was performed here (if we except its production a little time back at one of the semi-private concerts of the Midland Institute) for the first time, and "by desire." It is a work which its composer evidently "knocked-off in no time." It depends for the charm it evidently has on the little sprightly, fascinating "second subject" (one of those strains that "catch" the ear at once); the remaining portions of the overture consist, though, of nothing but bang and blare.

Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Eleanor Farnol were the vocalists engaged; and it is gratifying to note that they did nothing in their selection of songs to disgrace the instrumental portion of the concert. If "Do not mingle" hardly seems a tasteful pendant to Wagner's transcendent lyric, neither of the vocalists could well be blamed for the inconsiderate juxtaposition of two such pieces; and the programme-framer may justly plead the difficulty of arranging the heterogeneous items of a vocal and instrumental concert. Mr. Lloyd undoubtedly realised his very best in the incomparable "Preislied." The interest of the audience mounted to enthusiasm, and the artist was twice or thrice recalled. The graceful song by Mendelssohn as well as the ever-charming old aria from "Acis and Galatea," were likewise sung with all Mr. Lloyd's characteristic refinement of expression. Miss Farnol was most successful in Macfarren's florid soprano aria (from "St. John the Baptist"); she considerably enhanced the good opinion already formed of her powers. In the Bellini fiorituri she was a little out of her element, the light abandon, spontaneity, and flexibility of voice necessary to the part of the heroine of "La Sonnambula" being a little wanting on this occasion to our gifted townswoman. She sang the new song of Mr. Moir in an excellent, declamatory style, but the piece (whether wrongly placed or coming too late in the concert) did not make much impression. It is too pretentiously declamatory, not having sufficient melodic pith in it, and is too heavily orchestrated. The words, supposed to express pietic sentiment of the most fervent, ecstatic degree, are of the usual artificial order, and this alone might account for anything failing in the music.

Mr. Stockley conducted his forces with his customary tact and ability. Without endeavouring to bring out any subtle nuances of interpretation he is always safe, sound, and musicianly. It is only a matter of abstract justice to say this; compliments (simply as such) are thrown away on Mr. Stockley, as he is one of those wise gentlemen who make a point never to concern themselves with what is said in print about them.

I ought to mention that, at the previous concert, Spohr's Symphony, "Die Weihe der Töne" (undoubtedly that Master's instrumental chef d'œuvre) was produced in Birmingham for the first time, barring its preliminary trial before the Midland Institute people. This is the only great novelty as yet. On the next occasion, however (April 19th), Mr. Cowen is expected to conduct the first performance of his "Scandinavian" Symphony.

The Festival Choral Society, during the season, has brought forward Costa's "Eli," an unworthy performance; in parts a downright fiasco; and Gounod's "Redemption," insufficiently "cast" in the solo parts.

The Philharmonic Union, among other good things, have presented to us Hiller's "Song of Victory" and Mr. Stanford's orchestral "Serenade" (produced at the festival).

The Amateur Harmonic Association (under new restrictive regulations) have given a good miscellaneous concert. Among the items of the "sacred" part figured Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm and Spohr's 8th Psalm (for double chorus and solo voices). At their next concert (March 1st) Sullivan's "Prodigal Son" will be "revived," and another performance given of Mr. Gaul's festival work, "The Holy City."

Mr. Stratton's chamber concerts have become, by this time, a firm institution. A distinctive feature about them is the production at each concert of some instrumental novelty. Mr. Stratton's plébiscité of last season resulted in the second production of Mr. Stanford's piano quartet (this work having gained the largest number of votes.)

Among other pieces produced this season for the first time, I note Mr. Ebenezer Prout's string quartet, and a chamber composition by the late Charles Lucas, of the Royal Academy. An interesting production yet to be made will be a chamber composition by the late Mr. Griesbach.

Of the Amateur Musical Union I have had no signs.

The Musical Association still carries on successfully its work of disseminating the knowledge of good art among the people at large. The cheap Saturday Evening Concerts are as uniformly good and largely attended as ever. During the season of 1881-2 27 concerts were given in the Town Hall, at which the total attendance was 70,990, being an average of 2,629 per concert. Among the more important works produced have been Bennett's "May Queen," Gounod's "Gallia," Costa's "Date Sonitum," Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," and the cantata "To the Sons of Art"; Heap's "Voice of Spring," Bridge's "Boadicea," Gaul's "Ruth," Gade's "Crusaders," Anderton's "Wreck of the Hesperus," Rossini's "Song of the Titans"; also selections from "Messiah," "Elijah," "Judas Maccabeus," "Creation," "Stabat Mater," "Faust," "William Tell," and "Il Trovatore"; and the following orchestral works:—Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, and Romance in G for violin and orchestra, Schubert's ballet music in "Rosamunde," Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 4, overtures to "Masaniello," "William Tell," etc.

An amateur band and chorus has been formed (under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Stevens) in permanent connection with the association. BR.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The eleventh concert, promoted by the Chamber Music Society, took place at the Assembly Rooms, on January 16th. The fashionable audience was larger and more enthusiastic than at any of the previous concerts of the season. Messrs. Henry Holmes, Burnett, Gibson, and Howell gave a refined and intellectual rendering of Beethoven's quartet, No. 1, Op. 18, and Spohr's quartet, No. 1, Op. 58. Mr. Holmes, as a leader in a quartet, displays the rare gift of being able to animate his coadjutors, so that one mind and one will alone seems at work. The magnificent playing of Spohr's quartet brought to my memory the remarks made by the composer himself, to one of his friends some twenty years ago, when he had heard the two brother Holmes play in Cassel: "They caused everywhere the greatest sensation by their splendid playing, and especially excited admiration by their highly finished rendering of my own compositions."

Mr. Welch, of Durham Cathedral, was the vocalist, and Mr. Leggatt officiated as accompanist.

The programme for the next concert, on March 1st, will include, among other items, Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97, performed by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti. The vocalist will be Miss Carlotta Elliot.

Mr. W. Rea's second subscription concert was given on the 23rd.

Sir William Armstrong, with his well-known generosity, has given, a few days ago, £500 towards the adornment of the Cathedral. It is expected the gift will be appropriated towards the purchase of a case for the new organ, the work of Messrs. T. C. Lewis and Co., London, which is not yet completely finished. H. W.

VENTNOR.—The Ventnor Choral Society recently gave a concert under the conductorship of Mr. Edwin Lemare, whose zeal and ability, says a local journal, have been successfully devoted to the interests of the society since its formation, over 20 years ago. A large portion of Haydn's "Creation" was excellently given. In the miscellaneous selection, Mr. E. H. Lemare's artistic pianoforte playing was a decided feature. Mr. C. Fletcher also created a marked impression by his violin solo; Madame Clara Suter, Messrs. Fulkerson, and Frank May were the chief singers, and Mr. Frank Cox acted as organist.

KING'S LYNN.—The Philharmonic Society gave their first concert of the season to a large and attentive audience in the Music Hall, on Friday evening, Jan. 19th, under the direction of Dr. H. Hill, when the first part of the programme was devoted to Barnett's cantata "The Ancient Mariner," followed by a miscellaneous second part. The rendering of the cantata fully came up to all expectations, and afforded another proof of the steady progress the society has made. The principal vocalists were Miss Ellen Lamb, Miss E. Dones, Mr. Sidney Towers, and Mr. R. De Lacy (of St. Paul's Cathedral), all of whom did ample justice to their respective parts. The band largely augmented from Norwich and the district, and led as usual by Mr. John Bray, were well up to their work, but the brass element, perhaps at times seemed rather to predominate. Credit is due to the chorus, who were in capital form, and who with the exception of a bad start in the Bridal chorus, sustained their parts in a manner which showed at once their careful training. Mr. W. O. Jones presided at the organ, and Mr. J. H. Pratt at the piano. The second part commenced with Verdi's overture to "Nabucodonosor," which was excellently played by the band. Mr Sidney Towers gave a fine rendering of Sullivan's "Distant Shore," and in answer to repeated calls, he substituted as an encore "Good-bye, sweetheart, good-bye." Mr. Hutchinson's duet, "Tell me why you love me," was given by Miss Lamb and Mr. De Lacy, the last part being repeated. Miss Dones followed with a good performance of Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain," continually but unsuccessfully redemanded. Mr. J. Flint (formerly a resident) contributed a charming flute solo in the shape of a fantasia from "Lucia di Lammermoor." An attractive new song entitled "Trust not," from the pen of Dr. Hill was given, and was admirably sung by Miss Lamb, accompanied by the composer, both of whom were recalled at its conclusion. Mendelssohn's splendid part song, "The Hunters," followed, in which the basses showed themselves rather afraid of an E sharp towards the end. Next came Pinsuti's quartet "In this hour of softened splendour," which was sung to perfection by the principal vocalists unaccompanied, and fairly brought the house down; when seeing nothing short of an encore would suffice, Molloy's "Three Merry Men" was given in capital style. Balfe's favourite duet "The sailor sighs," was finely interpreted by Miss Dones and Mr. Tower. "Elijah" will now be put in rehearsal.—H. E. D.

The Cincinnati College of Music, under the presidency of G. Ward Nichols, seems to be a well-managed and prosperous institution. There are two departments in its scheme—an Academic Department and a General Music School—the Academic Department, for those who desire to become professionals, or amateurs who enter for graduation, all of whom will be required to pursue a definite course of study for a period of time; the General Music School, for general or special instruction, where any one may enter for a number of terms, receiving the valuable instruction which is afforded by the presence of a large number of excellent teachers (with the advantage of free admission to sixty other lessons, embracing a complete musical education, "lectures," "concerts," "recitals," "chorus," and other classes), with the best methods, exercises, text books, and the discipline of a well-appointed school.

JAN. 23, 1883.

The programmes at last Sunday's concerts were extremely interesting, though few novelties were presented in them.

At the Châtelet M. Colonne gave us another opportunity of hearing the ever welcome and delightful "Désert" of Félicien David, which was played with the usual thoroughness and brilliancy of the Châtelet orchestra, and duly appreciated.

M. Lamoureux treated us, at the Chateau d'Eau, to a well-nigh faultless execution of the glorious "Choral Symphony," and some charming selections from Gluck's "Armide" (to which I hope to return next week), together with such minor items as the "Hebrides" overture, and a selection from M. Lalo's "Namouna."

At the Cirque M. Pasdeloup gave us the appended :—

MONOTONIC READING IN CHURCH.

THAT wide-spread disease, that masterpiece of subtle malice we often dignify in its different manifestations as the odium theologicum, meets us in unexpected forms at times, and in Puritanical quarters directs its venom too often against "heaven-born "music." Strangely enough, the most simple, natural, congregational, and ancient of all musical institutions, such as Psalm-chanting and the musical rendering of the versicles are almost invariably the chief objects of attack. Happily, Psalm-chanting has securely passed to an all but universally recognised position in Divine Service, although it is still an institution requiring consideration and cultivation as to the best methods of its practical presentation. Then, again, the singing of Responses is rapidly gaining ground and is destined soon to be regarded as an essential as well as a most eloquent and venerable feature of Public Worship, as distinguished from private prayer. The artillery of those whose judgment being embittered by the poison of the odium theologicum are striving still to stay the musical bonds of unity in the Universal Church from attaining their full fruition and power for good, though becoming feebler and more uncertain from day to day, is not yet quite silenced; and the last engagements between those who love to see all the arts adorning the Service of the Most High, and those who more or less selfishly or ignorantly wish the one art, that of pulpit eloquence to retain its Puritanical monopoly, will possibly be fought out in connection with the questions concerning the use of a musical rendering of the responsive sentences and the monotone reading of the Prayers with their musical inflections. Doubtless until our clergy receive that musical training which must in the end be regarded as an indispensible feature of their scholastic preparations, we shall have to listen to the non-musical clergymen doing violence to general good judgment, perplexing their choirs and trying the growing musical perceptions of their congregations by reading exactly as they did in the by-gone days when they enjoyed as an accompaniment the droning voice of the parish clerk. Truly it is strange to find still in our midst, worthy clergymen who are credited with duly noting the signs of the times, but who yet deliberately persist in reading the prayers as Mr. HENRY IRVING reads Shakespeare, rather than render them as St. Ambrose would eloquently intone them. The inconsistency of the human mind when warped by prejudice never finds a more curious illustration than in connection with this subject. The good clergyman who will be horrified at the mere notion of the use of those beautiful old inflections the Church has ever cherished, will not hesitate to make any number of irrelevant, not to say unconsciously irreverent, inflections in his ordinary reading tone, and has perhaps even received his instructions from an actor, whose stage practice the clergyman would feel it derogatory to his calling and position to listen to. The object of these words is not the condemnation of good emphatic reading in its right place, but the assertion that the use of the monotone and the employment of certain time-honoured inflections should be regarded as essentially characteristic of the services of the Church. The construction of the interchangeable sentences of minister, choir, and people involve some simple form of musical recitation for their distinct and fitting enunciation; and the use of the monotone, with occasional restful inflections, must surely be the most effectual means whereby the avoidance of personal display, possible affectations of style, together with ill-regulated inflections of the reader's voice, may be judiciously and fully secured.

ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

II.

IT is well, in order to realise the nature of the task of reproduction or transcription from the musical forces we speak of collectively as the orchestra to the two great key-board instruments, the pianoforte and organ, to clearly set before our minds the broad distinctions of utterance, methods, phrasing, and tone-qualities existing between the two great instrumental divisions. There are, on the one hand, the vast accumulation of mental and physical power and never-ending shades of force and intermingled expressions in the orchestra, and on the other side the calmer fixed wind pressures of the organ with its set lines of demarcation by tone variations as produced by adding or deducting tiers of coldly speaking pipes, and as differing from the comparatively weak and fading—though wonderfully sensitive through touch—sounds of the pianoforte. Again, in methods of tone production the orchestra has the bowed instruments, a powerful army in themselves, the pipe-speaking flutes, the single reed clarinets, the double reed oboes and bassoons, the variously modelled open mouthpieces of the trumpets, horns, and trombones, and rhythm-marking instruments of percussion,—as distinguished from the less forcible and less sympathetic key actions of the organ and pianoforte. As regards phrasing powers, the orchestra possesses that magic force which arises from the close passage from note to note of the players' fingers and lips upon strings and tubes in a continuous vibratory condition, as differing from the distinctly formed sounds brought separately into existence by the intervening key mechanisms of the organ and pianoforte. Even with respect to tone-qualities, the orchestra is wonderfully rich in the purest, strongest sympathetic and living tone colours, and the rich store is possessed with a power of intermingling the distinct qualities and varying the lights and shades with a promptitude, character, and power entirely unapproachable, as distinguished from the calm, cold set-tone outlines of the organ and the but small powers of change—even possible with a remarkably developed sense of touch—of the pianoforte. In short, on the side of the orchestra are apparently endless tone riches; while the resources of the key-board instruments are much more limited in their nature, and are set out upon such fixed and definite lines as tend to the requirement of a pretty large exercise of the "art which hides art"; at the same time, these instruments possess the glorious faculty of embodying complete ideas and harmonies, and at least succeed in imitating, if not always realising those effects, which only attain their full glory through the multiform influences and kaleidoscope power of the orchestra. Of course it will be remembered that in dealing with the consideration of transference of musical ideas, one is not calling into question the peculiarly characteristic functions, the organic effects and pianisms which individualise the organ and pianoforte, as the medium of classical music of their own, even though so much of the thought power of such music essentially springs from the orchestra, as the very sun of the musical system and the great source of all tone colour effects.

FINSBURY PARK.

Many of the Nonconformist places of worship are alive to the necessity of sparing neither pains nor expense to make their musical services as attractive and elevating as possible, and foremost among them may be mentioned the Finsbury Park Wesleyan Chapel, which is now in possession of a very fine organ, built by the eminent firm, Messrs. Brindley & Foster, of Sheffield. The opening service took place on Wednesday evening, the 17th inst., when a selection of music was artistically performed by Mr. Fountain Meen, who abundantly displayed the capabilities of the instrument. The congregation also attentively listened to a fine rendering of vocal music by an augmented choir. During the evening the resident minister (the Rev. G. Stringer Rowe), announced that, chiefly owing to the exertions of the choir, who were fired by the enthusiasm and zeal of their able conductor and organist, Mr. C. J. Dale, the contributions received and promised were sufficient to discharge all liability in respect to the organ, but that a debt larger than the cost of the instrument had been incurred in the building of a suitable chamber. The opening services were continued on Sunday last, the organist for the morning being Mr. Ernest Squire (Stoke Newington Chapel), and for the evening Mr. Alfred Rhodes, R.A.M. (Rev. Baldwin Brown's church). The organist for to-morrow morning and evening will be Mr. J. P. Harding, of the Finsbury Choral Association. Appended is a description of the organ :—

EXPERIENCES OF AN ORGANIST.

V.

Encouraged by the attitude of Christian hostility assumed by the new parson towards the organist, the adverse critics of that unfortunate official gathered fresh strength and courage, and expressed their dissatisfaction freely, if not discriminatingly. The concluding voluntaries were too loud. Bach's fugues were not devotional. Batiste's Andante in G was better, but that was not played often enough. The hymns were sung too fast; the tunes were not judiciously selected. These and similar complaints reached the ears of "our dear pastor," who retailed them to me, and week after week I was tormented with various remedial suggestions, often of a conflicting nature, until I began seriously to consider whether thirty pounds a year was a sufficient remuneration for the annoyance which I experienced.

I had now been organist at this church for three years. During the latter half of that period I had been diligently studying music, both practically and theoretically, under one of the best masters in England. I was preparing for a university degree, and had already passed the preliminary examination. It will, therefore, be seen that I must have been much better fitted for my position at the end of these three years than I was at the beginning. And yet no one in the congregation appeared to be at all aware that I had improved in the least. When I first came I was pronounced to be excellent; my playing and conducting met with general approval, and I seemed to give satisfaction to everybody. Now, however, although I had, in the meantime, been working hard to make myself a better musician, I met with nothing but hostile criticism, and seemed to give satisfaction to nobody. Disheartening as such an experience must be to any one, it was particularly so to me, because, in my youthful ignorance, I did not then know that it was a common experience of organists, but thought my case a singular one, and was puzzled to understand my failure. There is a proverb which every organist, and indeed every other public man, would do well to bear in mind—"New brooms sweep clean." My dear young reader, you whose feet and fingers are just beginning to run the musical race which is set before you, when you get your first appointment, do not be too elated by the encomiums which your doubtless very remarkable abilities will receive, but think of your unfortunate predecessor, who at first met with a similar reception, but who is now considered of no account in comparison with you, and has been got rid of without compunction. Remember the proverb above quoted, and reflect that in two or three years' time you, too, may fail to give satisfaction, and be cast aside like a worn-out broom. Do not flatter yourself that your superior talents will prevent such a catastrophe. That those talents are of a superior order I have not the slightest doubt, otherwise you would hardly care to read such writings as mine. But your talents will not avail you. The religious public is a fickle one, quite as fickle as the political public, and a good deal more wily. Deacons are like domestic servants in one respect, they are rather fond of a change; and the flocks which they lead have the nomadic instinct strongly developed, and are continually on the look out for fresh pasturage in the form of a new minister or a new organist, each of whom they consider as so much green stuff to be either swallowed up or mowed down in due course.

The tide having, at length, so decidedly turned against me, I was not greatly surprised when, one evening, I received a letter from one of the diaconate, informing me that, at a meeting of the minister and deacons, it had been decided that in future the minister should select the tunes, and that I was to be forbidden to play any other than soft voluntaries at the conclusion of the services, as the loud ones were calculated to destroy the effect of the sermon. (We had beautiful sermons from our new parson, and it certainly was a pity to destroy their effect.) These restrictions, however, seemed to me to be unwarrantable, and I felt that I could not submit to them. If the minister selected the tunes, why should not the organist select the hymns? If he chose my voluntaries, why should not I choose his texts? If he objected to my playing Bach's fugues, why should he be allowed to make use of Barnes's Commentaries? This is the way I, in my presumption, reasoned to myself, and the conclusion to which I came was that I was an ill-used person, and that, rather than my privileges should be curtailed in the manner proposed, it would be better for me to resign my position, notwithstanding the enormous pecuniary sacrifice which such a course would entail. I therefore sent in my resignation. Not many weeks afterwards, having taken an affecting leave of my two particular friends, the organ and the organ-blower, not to mention one other even more particular friend, who chanced to come into the church to "look for her hymn-book" (so she said), I disappeared from the vineyard in which I had been labouring, and left the sour grapes to be sucked by my successor.

The sense of freedom which I experienced was at first a delicious one. To see my brother-organists working away on their several treadmills Sunday after Sunday, while it awakened my compassion, was not calculated to lessen my happiness. I felt like a bird that had escaped out of the snare of the fowler. In a short time, however, my feelings changed. I grew discontented with my liberty, and longed for bondage again, like the Israelites in the Wilderness. Then I began to answer advertisements, and attend organ-competitions. I do not know what may be the opinion of other organists regarding organ-competitions, but, for my own part, I cannot say that I like these trials of skill. To me they are trials in more senses than one. On such occasions, when my turn comes, and I walk up to the organ-seat, I experience a sensation somewhat similar, I suppose, to that of the soldier who walks up to the mouth of a loaded cannon. In the one case, as in the other, an unusual amount of courage is requisite, but the military hero has this advantage, that, if he be successful, he may expect to be rewarded with the Victoria Cross, while the musical hero, however successful he may be, cannot hope to be similarly honoured. But why not? "Peace hath her victories, no less renown'd than war;" and if Her Majesty only knew what deeds of heroism are daily performed by organists in the battle of life, I feel convinced that even these much despised beings would sometimes obtain a decoration from Her gracious hands—a cross, a star, or perhaps (if the squeamish reader will excuse my mentioning it), a garter! Of course, the amount of courage needed by the musical competitor depends a good deal upon the nature of the competition in which he is called upon to take part. To display one's musical skill before a miscellaneous church or chapel committee is not a very serious matter. With these committees a little impudence goes a long way, and is often mistaken for genius. The self-satisfied but ill-taught organist who works the swell-pedal up and down as though he were at a sewing-machine, and who moves his head and body from side to side like the lions in the Zoological Gardens, is almost sure to make a profound impression. But to perform before a professional umpire of established reputation is quite a different thing, and is, I think, as trying an ordeal as the most penance-loving sinner could wish to pass through. What more terrible predicament can be imagined than that of the nervous candidate who, touching the pedals with trembling toes, discovers, too late, that he has drawn the trombone instead of the bourdon, or who, putting his unready hands on the wrong keyboard, hears his intended soft chords coming out fortissimo on the trumpet stop? Yet such mishaps will sometimes occur when the player loses his presence of mind. However, after taking part, with more or less trepidation, in several of these musical conflicts, I had, at last, the good fortune to be successful in one of them, and so obtained a new appointment.

This time I found myself among Scotchmen, the church to which I was appointed organist being a Presbyterian church. Hitherto the music in this church had been without instrumental accompaniment, the use of the organ having until quite recently been prohibited by the Presbyterian Synod. The organ, therefore, was a new one, having only just been erected when I came. It was a large, three-manual instrument, with forty stops, and was a considerable improvement upon the organ at which I had previously presided. The salary, too, was much larger than that which I had formerly received, being fifty pounds a year. A good deal of attention had always been paid to the musical portion of the services, and I found the singing to be much above the average of congregational singing. A somewhat unusual, and, to my mind, highly advantageous plan was adopted in the formation of the choir. Every musical member of the congregation was urged to enrol himself or herself a member of the choir, and to attend the practices, and thus a large choir of sixty or seventy voices was obtained. This was divided into two equal parts, each of which occupied the choir-seats alternately month by month, those who were off duty being scattered about the congregation. Hence it will be seen that the organist, while he was surrounded by a complete and sufficiently numerous choir, was, at the same time, enabled to rely upon the assistance of individual members of that body in all parts of the building. By this means the tendency to drag and to sing flat, which is so characteristic of congregational singing, was to a great extent obviated.

The organ, being an innovation, had its enemies, of course, though they were fortunately few. Some of them, however, when they found it no longer possible to exclude the instrument, made a strenuous effort to prevent the use of the usual opening and concluding voluntaries, and to confine the organist to the playing of hymn-tunes, hoping thus, no doubt, to restrain within narrower limits the evil influence which they expected the newly-imported musical monster to exercise. Failing in this attempt, the indignation of these fervent souls (the faithful few who would not bow the knee to Baal) knew no bounds, and was a sight which angels might have witnessed with pleasure, if angels have any sense of the ridiculous. On the Sunday on which the organ was first used they listened with horror to the strains of Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers," with which the morning service concluded, and declared that the performance was a desecration both of the sanctuary and of the Sabbath; and when, in the evening, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was played, by the special desire of some heterodox Scotchman, one female saint, whose ideas concerning music, either secular or sacred, must have been somewhat vague, was heard to remark, as she walked haughtily out of the church, that "such profanity was terrible to witness," and that it was "as bad as being in a theatre!"

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

A correspondence much too lengthy for these columns, between Messrs. Lennox Browne and Llewelyn Thomas and the Secretary of Trinity College, has been forwarded by the two gentlemen first named. Reluctantly compelled from want of space to give only the chief points of the matter contained in the letters, I will endeavour—trying to take as my guide the motto Recté et suaviter—to give the leading points of the correspondence. In the first letter Messrs. Lennox Browne and Thomas, as lecturers on "Vocal and Aural Physiology," note that "an examination paper was set in vocal and aural physiology, by Mr. James Keene, to the pupils of Trinity College. We should like to know on what course of lectures that examination was based."

In reply the College Secretary writes that the examination paper in question set by Mr. Keene was "not based upon any course of lectures, as no lectures have been delivered here on the subject since January-April, 1881. May I venture to say that I do not see the object of your enquiry, as I assume that your knowledge of the working of the College is sufficiently intimate for you to know that the examinations are open to all comers, not only College students, and that vocal and aural physiology is but a part of the examination scheme." It is difficult to see why an institution which has always selected its examiners from the leading professors of each scientific or artistic department, regardless of the question of immediate connection with the institution, and so fairly claimed public confidence in its examinations, should not continue to pursue a course which, as regards the public at least, can only be spoken of as highly honourable. However, Messrs. Lennox Browne and Llewelyn Thomas do not take this view, and write that they "do not desire to be a party to a scheme which, while publishing the names of lecturers, and an elaborate prospectus of a school for the study of vocal and aural physiology, takes no trouble to consult the appointed lecturers and teachers in the school, but at the same time leads the public to understand that these special advantages are employed." And they add:—"We should have resigned some time ago, when Mr. Keene was appointed an examiner on these subjects, without consultation with either of us, though one is an original member of your Council, had it not been from a desire not to do anything which might appear inimical to your interests."

Next Mr. Lennox Browne writes singly to the College secretary thus:—"Some years ago, without any consultation with me, or indeed without any communication whatever, I found my name printed in your Calendar as 'Lecturer on Public Health.' I spoke on the subject to your predecessor, but consented, at his request, to allow it so to remain. Since, however, I have never been asked to give a single lecture on the subject, and as probably not a single pupil has ever asked for a course." The question why Mr. Lennox Browne waited for a grievance, real or imaginary, before setting himself right in this matter, may or may not have arisen from a natural feeling of kindly forbearance, though it is somewhat unfortunate that he has thought fit to revive here what he must surely have noticed long ago, and which may be explainable in the formation of young institutions, as arising from the desire of individual promoters to strengthen their scheme by informally, and perhaps only verbally, asking for the co-operation of the most eminent living authorities on given subjects. Next the secretary of "The Central Throat Hospital" informs the corresponding official of Trinity College of the to be expected expiration of the privileged connection of the students of the last-named with the former institution in these words, which form a resolution it was intended to move before the Hospital Committee: "That any association of this hospital as a school for lectures on vocal and aural physiology with Trinity College, London, be dissolved." A corresponding resolution of the Academical Board of Trinity College closes the correspondence forwarded, in these words: "As no advantage appears to have been gained by the College students of Vocal and Aural Physiology by the connection existing between the London Throat and Ear Hospital and Trinity College, it is hereby decided to resign the connection with that institution."—ED. *Mus. ORGAN RECITALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Some time since attention was called in your columns to the lack of judgment frequently displayed by organists in the incongruity of the various pieces selected for performance at recitals in churches.

An evil of the same nature, but in my estimation of far greater magnitude, is that of the unseemly choice of music sometimes made for church voluntaries. These should, I think, in every case, at least be free from secular associations, and also of a dignified nature, in order to correspond with the services to which they form a commencement and an end. Unfortunately, these conditions are not infrequently violated, "The Funeral March of a Marionette" having very lately done duty as a concluding voluntary at an important church in the north of London, and selections from the "May Queen" at another church in the same district.

It cannot be too strongly impressed upon such organists how much they detract from the dignity of the position they occupy by such a choice of music, and how much violence they must do to the good taste and reverent feelings of the congregation.

I am, dear Sir, yours very truly, J. B.

A SUGGESTION.

At a meeting under the presidency of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, convened in order to carry out the project of erecting memorials to the memory of the late Archbishop Tait, it was decided to carry out the following objects:—(1) To place a monument in Canterbury Cathedral; (2) To erect memorials in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral; (3) And to undertake the completion and restoration of Lambeth Palace Chapel; and it was further settled "That while this committee resolves that any surplus which may remain shall be devoted to some purpose of public usefulness, and is disposed to view favourably the resolution first proposed, it is of opinion that the determination upon the matter should be adjourned to a future day."

Now, surely no memorial could be in better taste or equal in practical usefulness than a new organ for Canterbury Cathedral. The late Archbishop, it is true, was not what in these days may be called a "musical man," but officially he was connected with music and musical institutions, and personally he wisely regarded the advancement of good, sound, well rendered church music as an important essential to the well-being and healthy progress of the Church. Then, look at the present state of affairs in our chief cathedral. The great metropolitan church at Canterbury is musically furnished with a miserable instrument of inadequate resources and in a chronic condition of unplayableness, if one may coin a word. Such an instrument would not be tolerated in any ordinary church with a congregation having any claims to self-respect, or possessing any desire to see the home of Divine worship decently and properly furnished. The worthy organist of Canterbury Cathedral, it is true, patiently continues his trying work upon a worn-out, worthless, and utterly inadequate instrument, upon which no properly written organ music can be said to be playable, year after year; and in the grand old church even the present miserable organ rolls through the vaulted aisles with an effect to some extent misleading, as tending to leave the easy-going people of the sleepy, quiet city satisfied with the skilfully-handled and yet very unworthy machine. But this question is at once a national as well as a local one; and there is now an opportunity for both national and local action which should not be lost. One monumental proposal has been the fitting preparation of the new Archbishop's palaces, but surely the seemly furnishing of the house of God would be a far more worthy undertaking. It is to be hoped that earnest and immediate action will be taken in this matter. The attention of the Cathedral authorities, of the memorial committee, and all interested, if not prompted by the obvious necessity and absolute propriety of the course pointed out, should be aroused by a vigorous expression of local and general public opinion.—ED. Musical Standard.

Passing Events.

The Richter Concerts will take place at St. James's Hall on May 7th, 10th, 21st, 28th; June 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th, and July 2nd. Rehearsals for the choir will be held every Friday evening at the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. Gye was travelling from Philadelphia to New York to meet Mdme. Albani, when, during a slight detention of the train, he left the car for a moment, and on returning he missed a satchel containing property worth fifty thousand dollars. A solitaire and a pair of earrings which the late Czar gave to Madame Albani are the chief items of loss. The other property consisted of jewellery and cash.—Globe.

Mr. Eustace J. Breakspeare has been authorised by Professor Heinrich Ehlich, of Berlin, to undertake the English translation of his recent work entitled "Die Musik-Æsthik," and Mr. Breakspeare is at the present time engaged upon a translation of Dr. Edward Hanslick's "Vom Musikalisch Schonen." No more competent writer could have been found to undertake these congenial tasks.

All readers will regret to learn that Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, the well-known and much esteemed organist, is suffering from ill-health, brought on by overwork. His physician, Dr. Hughlings Jackson, has ordered him to take a rest of at least six weeks, and to proceed at once upon a voyage to America. It is to be earnestly hoped that Mr. C. Warwick Jordan will soon be able to resume his professional duties with completely restored health and strength.

Mr. Maurice Strakosch, who is Miss Thursby's impresario, is carrying out during the present month an original scheme, known as a "Historical Concert Cyclus," consisting of five concerts, given at Chickering Hall, New York. This "Cyclus" included the performance of about one hundred compositions, dating from Palestrina, 1524, to the latest and most modern composers. The "Cyclus" was interpreted by Miss Emma Thursby, assisted at each concert by distinguished artists.

The Musical Courier has the following sensible words:—"A public début is a serious matter for a young student, and it is to be regretted that its importance is not more generally felt. In that event we should not have the frequent spectacle of immature players showing off their unfitness to appear before a critical tribunal. It is a great mistake for those who should be studying thus to injure themselves at the outset, and teachers who permit and urge scholars to make too early a début do a wrong all round."

Mr. Thomas Hopkinson, of Hull, whose writings and suggestions are known and duly appreciated by the readers of this paper, has spent some thought upon a proposal to form a "Board of Musical Commissioners," to use his own words, for the inspection of new musical works, aud to initiate steps for the due recognition of works of merit. Such a board, if properly constituted and fully recognised, would indeed do useful work, and greatly forward the interests of English art. Mr. Hopkinson thinks that the first steps in this direction might be well taken by some one of our well established educational institutions.

The kind attention and interest of the many musical Freemasons is hereby solicited in behalf of Ernest Arthur Steed, who is a candidate for the April election at the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys. This little fellow is the son of the late Mr. A. Orlando Steed, who died suddenly of typhoid fever at the age of 42 only, leaving a widow and seven children under 13, without adequate means of support. Mr. A. Orlando Steed was greatly esteemed as a gifted, thoughtful, painstaking musician, and some of his writings have been duly appreciated by the readers of this paper. Votes may be sent to the Rev. C. J. Martyn, Long Melford Rectory, Suffolk; W. H. Cummings, Esq., Thurlow Park Road, Dulwich, S.E.; J. H. Jewell, Esq., Westerham, Kent; William Cook, Esq., St. John's, Penge, S.E. As an expression of respect for the departed musician, and as a real exercise of kindly charity, it is to be hoped that all possible help will be given.

Church Bells has a short but appreciative notice of the late John Crowdy, who contributed an admirable series of papers on church music to that weekly publication.

"Iolanthe," although somewhat sharply criticised at first, continues to do very well at the Standard, New York, says the Musical Critic, and thus far duplicates the success of "Patience."

Verdi has written a letter of condolence to M. Gambetta, the elder, on the death of his illustrious son. The Italian representative composer has himself attained considerable experience in the political world.

The closing Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre have included some excellent selections. One night furnished "Faust" music from the various settings of that inexhaustible legend.

On Sunday last, special services were given at St James's, Stepney, and collections made in aid of the funds of the Self-Help-Mission for poor girls of that parish. After the evening service an organ recital was given to a large congregation by Dr. R. Sloman.

The Leicester Amateur Harmonic Society gave Mr. J. Farmer's "Christ and his Soldiers" on the 15th, under the conductorship of Mr. D. T. Jackson. Mr. W. J. Bunney was the organist. The chief singers were Mrs. Kirby, Miss Blackwell, Mr. M. Roline, and Mr. Ford.

Miss Annie Glen gave her first concert at Steinway Hall on Thursday, January 25th. The artists were: Miss Annie Glen, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. Bicknell Young, Mr. Frank L. Moir; violoncello, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse; pianoforte, Miss Thomas, Miss Adelaide Thomas, and Mdlle. Mazzucato; conductors, Signor Visetti, Mr. Eaton Faning, and Mr. Harvey Lohr.

Herr Max Bruch, says the Athenæum, having accepted an appointment as Capellmeister at Breslau, is resigning his post as conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. Judging from past experience, it is probably too much to hope that the directors of the society will show sufficient respect for native art to elect an Englishman as successor to Herr Bruch.

Mozart's music to "King Thamos" was performed for the first time in England last Monday evening by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, at Shoreditch Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. E. Prout. This interesting work includes the original version of two of the composer's motets, as they are called in their Latin adaptation.

The popular Bow and Bromley organ recitals are to be resumed to-night, when Dr. J. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" will be repeated, and amongst early engagements to be noted are those of Mr. Best and Mons. Guilmant. An opportunity of hearing those favourite players which should not be missed. Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool, will give the recitals of Feb. 3rd and 10th.

On Friday evening the 12th inst. a handsome silver salver was presented to Mr. James Partridge, formerly organist of St. Andrew's, Hammersmith, on his retirement from that office, after holding it nearly six years. The salver bore the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. James Partridge, A.R.A.M., by Members of the Choir and Choral Society of St. Andrew's, Hammersmith, Christmas, 1882."

A very successful concert took place in the Corn Exchange, Ely, on Wednesday, January 10th, organised by Mr. H. Martin Cooke, in which the following artists assisted:—The Misses Constance and Eva Layton (soprano and mezzo-soprano), Mr. Taylor (bass), Miss Edith Greenop (pianoforte), Herr J. Ludwig (1st) and Mr. R. B. Creak (2nd violin), Mr. Blagrove (viola and solo concertina), and Mons. B. Albert (solo violoncello).

The authorities of the College of Organists have arranged for some of their lecture meetings to be held at the Holborn Town Hall: one by Mr. E. Prout on Feb. 6th on the "Orchestra in Combination with the Organ, especially in Church Music," and a course of four lectures by Professor G. A. Macfarren on "Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues by J. S. Bach," a work issued after the wonderful forty-eight preludes and fugues, these lectures being given on Feb. 20th, 27th, March 6th and 13th. The remaining lectures of the season, it is understood, will be given at the Neumeyer Hall. Members of the College are invited to attend, and their friends are also welcomed.

QUERY.

FRENCH MUSICAL PAPER.—Can any of your readers give me the name of a good monthly musical paper in the French language; also the price, and where it may be obtained in England?—H. B.

REPLY.

CHRISTMAS ANTHEM.—Referring to the query of Jas. B. Shaw in Musical Standard of 13th inst., I do not know if the anthem, "I know their sorrows," by Edward Sturges, is published, but in the service lists for Christmas Day, 1875, published in Concordia of that date, I find the anthem in question was sung at St. Peter's Church, Manchester; in all probability it is in the church books in MS., I never having seen a copy of it. Mr. Shaw would doubtless get the desired information by applying to the above-mentioned church. Mr. Sturges my father) was born Feb. 25th, 1808, and died Feb. 16th, 1848, being within a few days of 40 when he died.—EDWD. J. STURGES.—The anthem "I know their sorrows," by Edward Sturges, was published by Shepherd & Jones, 40, Warwick Lane, Newgate Street, and it was sold in Edinburgh by Wood and Co., Waterloo Place.—BILLINIE PORTER.

TRIADS: THEIR RELATIONSHIP AND TREATMENT.

By Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus. Doc.

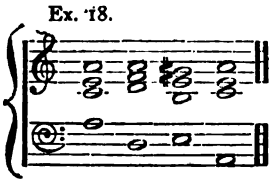
I will now put before you some ordinary progressions in the key of A minor.

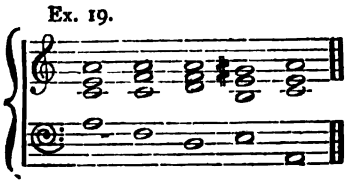
The first and most obvious progression is, as in the major key, from tonic to dominant and back again. Next, we may proceed from the tonic to the minor chord on the fourth of the scale, which, like the major key, has a bond of union with the tonic, because the 5th of one is the root of the other. If this is followed by the dominant harmony, we are at once led back to our tonic. (N.B.—It must be remembered that the so-called "sub-dominant" chord has a true minor 3rd and perfect 5th, and so differs from the chord on D in the scale of C major).

Ex. 18.



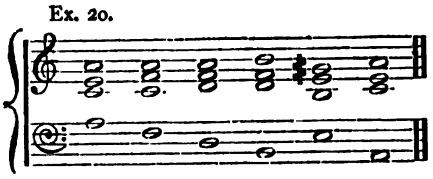
We have seen, however, that there is a close relationship between two chords whose roots are a third apart, and, as the scale of A minor contains a triad upon F, the intervals of which are a true major 3rd and a perfect 5th from the root, we may insert this major concord between the first two chords of the last example:—

Ex. 19.



Thus far the successions of chords in the minor scale correspond exactly to the first few quotations of chords based upon the major scale. We may even go further, and may admit, to make the correspondence more complete, the dissonant triad on the 2nd degree of the scale, provided that this is followed by dominant harmony:—

Ex. 20.



You will recollect that the triad on the 2nd degree of the major scale has been referred to a dominant root. I here regard the triad on B in a similar light. D and F are respectively the dominant 7th and minor 9th to the root E. Here, however, the resemblance between the major and minor key for the present ceases. In the major key we were able to use a minor triad on the 3rd of the scale, following upon the dominant chord, and followed by the minor chord on the 6th of the scale. In the minor key no similar concord is available, because the interval from C to G ♯ is an augmented 5th.

Having now noticed the triads which are commonly used in the minor key, we shall be able to account for some further progressions which may occur in the major key. Let me play two:—

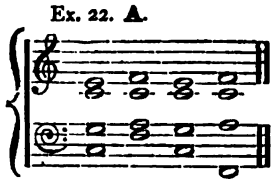
Ex. 21. A.

Ex. 21. B.

In both of these examples the 3rd chord is that which we have discovered to be not a true concord in the scale of C, and yet it is not followed as before by dominant harmony. Two explanations of its good effect may be offered. One is that A, the major 9th above the dominant, is retained for two chords, and eventually resolved, while F, the 7th, is resolved at once upon E. The other possible explanation is that the chord in question is followed, and, in one case, also, preceded, by the chord of A minor, so that it may be regarded as a true minor triad borrowed for the moment from the scale of A minor.

I have before spoken of the slight element of disturbance in the tonality felt, by myself at all events, whenever the "sub-dominant" chord occurs. I must now add my opinion that it is only when we use tonic and dominant harmony alternately that we can be said to be literally and exactly in any one key. If I play to you the following:—

Ex. 22. A.



the passage is clearly, I think, in F, although the first chord is the chord of C, but if I play the first four chords of a recent example:—

and rest there, we receive no decided impression as to the key. The fact appears to be, that in every piece of music passages occur in which it would be difficult to say at certain moments what the key really is. It is this view which, to my mind (as I have already said), gives to music its charm, and composers are thus able, by lingering on certain chords, or progressions of chords, not strictly belonging to the key to which they are going or returning, to keep the hearers in a state of expectation and interest until a cadence is reached.

It is far from my intention or wish to recommend to you for general purposes that vagueness or confusion of tonality which may be sometimes met with, more especially in the writings of those whose minds are imbued with a flavour of old church modes, derived from constant association with the Gregorian tones. But even this amount of indecision in regard to the key may have its proper place; and the composer, whose judgment is sound and experience mature, may sometimes venture to express a feeling of restlessness by wavering between two keys, or for some special effect to bring about a startling surprise by a leap into some remote tonality. Such considerations are, however, beside my present purpose, which is to consider the relationship of chords to a key note and to one another. My next step will be to endeavour to find a reason for the ill-effect of what is known as the "false relation of tritone," or, as the old authorities had it, "Mi contra fa."

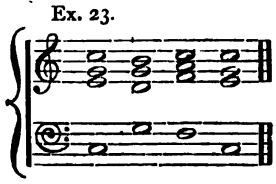
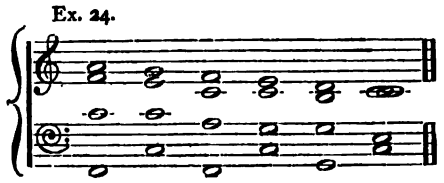
Hitherto, with one exception, the only progressions spoken of have been those in which both chords have had one or more notes in common. The exception has been in the progression from the "sub-dominant" of a key to the dominant. We have seen that this succession of chords may be grateful to the ear in spite of the apparent "false relation of tritone"; but if we reverse the chords the result is not satisfactory:—

Ex. 23.



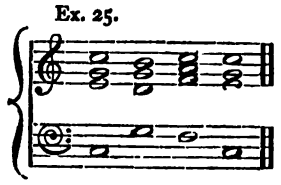
To explain this we must again make experiments with the scale harmonized as a melody. Although, in attempting to harmonize the descending scale with the three triads from which it was produced, we were stopped at the third note, we may, by beginning at this note, harmonize all the remaining notes of the scale with its fundamental chords only:—

Ex. 24.



Now, there is no doubt that in all chord progressions when the parts move in notes of equal value, and with equal strength and quality, the highest part is that which most strongly arrests attention. When, therefore, we move thus—

Ex. 25.



the effect is unexpected and disagreeable, for when the melody proceeds from the leading note to the keynote it is simply the concluding progression of the ascending scale, and this points to dominant and tonic harmony as the most natural accompaniment. But if we alter the position of the parts thus—the effect is wholly different. The melody now consists of two fragments of the descending scale with the skip of a 3rd intervening, and the chords are those which have been already employed in harmonizing similar progressions.

Ex. 26.

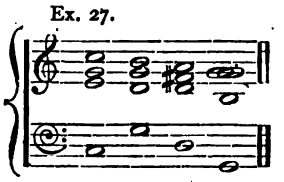
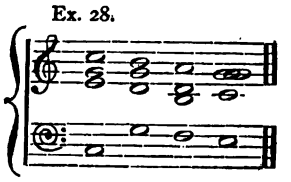
But, you may ask, is there no way of accompanying the upper half of the descending scale satisfactorily with three common chords? Strictly speaking, there is not. Still, if we modulate to the scale of G, we obtain a result very like the upper portion of the scale of C:—

Ex. 27.



although the sharper A (the perfect 5th above D) does not belong to the latter scale. The whole difficulty arises from the fact that between the 4th and 5th, and between the 6th and 7th degrees of the major scale the interval of a major tone occurs, so that when these notes stand a major 3rd apart in the relation of treble and bass to each other, both parts proceed by a major tone. This was found objectionable by the old contrapuntists. It is still considered bad in two-part writing, and it is peculiarly offensive in descending unless the resources of modern harmony are brought to our aid; thus—

Ex. 28.



Here the 2nd and 3rd chords are of course traced to the same root by modern theorists.

Let me now call your attention to a very familiar progression from one chord to another having no note in common with it:—

Ex. 29. A.

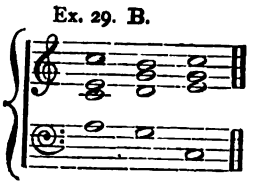
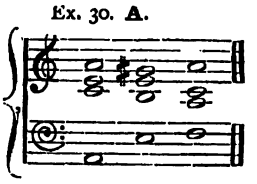
Ex. 29. B.



Both these are of common occurrence, and their justification no doubt lies in the fact already noticed, that the chord of A minor is most intimately connected with that of C major, containing, as it does, its essential and characteristic notes—C and E. In each case the minor chord forms a satisfactory substitute for that which is commonly, and, as I believe, correctly, called its "relative major" chord. Similar considerations will shew that the following progressions are not only agreeable but also justifiable:—

Ex. 30. A.



Ex. 30. B.

The chord of A minor, if my view is correct, owes its origin to the harmonic series, having F for its root, and from this cause it possesses its two characteristic notes, A and C, in common with the chord of F. The latter, therefore, serves as excellent deputy for the former.

It should be observed in the foregoing examples that the doubling of the keynote to avoid consecutive 5ths strengthens our feeling that the chord on the 6th of the scale is a near relative of the tonic chord.

Reference has already been made to the anomalous position of the triad upon the 2nd degree of the major scale. I will now endeavour to show that this is not merely a fanciful theory, but that an appeal to the ear will prove the accuracy of my statement that a true minor triad on D has no place in the scale of C major. Let me however first remind you of a belief, which I have already expressed, and for which I am indebted to Professor Macfarren's interesting "Lectures on Harmony," that, in spite of equal temperament, we all of us unconsciously accept the divisions of the scale, not for what they actually are, but for what they should be.

Now, when the chord in question is played, it gives us one or the other of two possible impressions. We listen to it either as a true minor concord, or as a dissonant combination. Whatever view you take of the following progression :—

Ex. 31. A.

I think you will admit at all events a want of connection between the 2nd and 3rd chords; whereas, if I play the two following :—

Ex. 31. B.

Ex. 31. C.

the effect is satisfactory. The explanation I offer is that in the 1st example either the A and F are discords, and should be resolved, or else the D is a note which does not belong to the scale of C. In the 2nd example the discords are sooner or later resolved, and in the 3rd the chord is treated as a true concord belonging to the scale of A minor.

One other proof I will advance. If I play the chord of C and then that of D minor, with consecutive 5ths between the treble and bass,

Ex. 32. A.

the effect is undeniably bad. If, however, you will listen to an apparently similar succession of 5ths, with an alteration of one of the inner parts, I think you will feel with me that the impression is much altered, and that, although the objectionable effect may not be entirely mitigated, it is certainly somewhat softened :—

Ex. 32. B.

The explanation of this change will now, I think, suggest itself to your minds. In the former case we received the impression that the highest and lowest part were proceeding by parallel movement in two different scales; in the latter case the B ♮ added to the tenor part refers us to G as the root, and to A and F, not as true concords above D, but as the dominant 9th and 7th in the key of C.

It will be seen that last Saturday, to commemorate Mozart's birthday, the programme was devoted entirely to his works. The quintet, introduced at these concerts by Mr. Lazarus twenty-three years ago, was rendered in an entirely perfect manner; though, of course, the lion's share of the glory belongs to the clarionetist, or, as the programme somewhat fancifully puts it—"The Quintet in A major may be regarded as a musical drama, in which the clarionet supports the character of the hero (a lover, most likely, Mozart being the author), the other personages, represented by the four stringed instruments, being grouped around the chief figure, and, as in respect and duty bound, uttering 'no more than is set down for them' —so that no 'necessary question' of the musical design may be disturbed or interrupted." Surely the variations that composed the finale of this work were never surpassed, even by Beethoven, for ingenuity and interest, until Schumann came and gave a new life to this most time-honoured form! The rest of the programme is too well known to call for special mention, and it is not necessary to say that complete justice was done to each and all of the works in the performance.

"Look at all those disagreeable people going out!" a lady was heard to remark, during the quartet. (There certainly was a longer stream even than usual leaving the Hall). How the lady in question came to know that all these people whose time is so precious are "disagreeable," it is not for to me decide; nevertheless, it cannot do any harm to let them know that they are placed on that category unhesitatingly by perhaps a large number of their fellow auditors.

Miss Santley's songs were not suited to her; but she was in this instance bound down to one composer and one style. "Pupille amate" especially she must have found trying; but she hid her want of ease with the skill of a thorough artist, and Mr. Zerbini's accompaniments were in every respect excellent.

Accompanist . . . Mr. Zerbini.

It will be seen that Mozart again figured conspicuously, although not exclusively in the scheme; but this quartet was the penultimate of all, written seven years after the one in D minor, performed on the previous Saturday. The larghetto in E flat, where the first violin is silent at the opening, would stamp the composer's individuality in any part of the world; not only the melody, but the "decomposition" of the rhythm are unmistakable, and the subject may be called sublime. The minuet, with its piquant divisions of semiquavers in the first and fifth bars, is no less thoroughly characteristic, and its trio regales the eye as a specimen of neatest counterpoint, illustrative of heaven's first law, order—never by true musicians to be violated.

Rheinberger's pianoforte quartet, introduced in 1874 by Dr. Hans von Bülow, should be eulogised for the same observance of canonical construction, whilst the themes, especially in the first movement, sound positively refreshing after the dry and laboured works of certain erudite but not always inspired writers. The two inner movements (adagio and minuet) are in G major and minor. Mdme. Frickenhaus, the pianist of the evening, conducted the work in admirable style, and played Schumann's "Faschingschwank," not only with fine taste, but after a manner that recalled to mind the interpretation by the composer's gifted wife. An encore ensued, and Mdme. Frickenhaus volunteered one of the "Lieder ohne worte," nicknamed "The Bee's Wedding." Mdme. Norman-Néruda had a double recall after Rust's sonata; and Mr. Santley was honoured in the same way. The audience were enthusiastic. Reverting to Schumann's pianoforte works, his partiality for flat keys is remarkable. In this case, as in the "Carnaval," the "Humoreske," and the "Kreisleriana," he adheres to the tonalities of B flat, D minor, G minor, E flat, and their cognates. Mr. Charles Hallé, on Monday next, will introduce two valses of Chopin for the first time, marked as "Op. 64," in C sharp minor and D flat.

[In a recent notice the printer made the key of Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata" F major instead of F minor.] A. M.

MISS ANNIE GLEN'S CONCERT.

A few details of Miss Glen's first concert (briefly reported last week, as a matter of fact) will be interesting. The young lady may be congratulated on a fair success, to which no doubt her pleasing physiognomy and winning manner contributed almost as much as her fine vocalization. Miss Glen sang Schubert's "Ständchen" and Meyerbeer's "Fisher-Maiden" with a range from C to F and G; she won a bis for Robandi's florid Italian song in F, "Alla Stella Confidente," where high A has to be attacked and taken, to use the phraseology of military tactics. Miss Glen certainly captured, or captivated, her audience.

The dramatic duet of Félicien David in E flat, "La nuit déployant ses ailes," interpreted by Miss Glen and Mr. Redfern Hollins made an adequate impression; the more so, as sung for the first time in London. In the absence of another lady, Miss Glen played on the harmonium Chopin's Nocturne in E flat, and Mozart's "Deh Vieni olla finestra" from "Don Giovanni." Her rendering of the ballad "My heart is sair" won another encore. The assistant vocalists included Messrs. R. Hollins, B. Young, and F. L. Moir. Pianoforte pieces were played by Miss Adelaide Thomas, Mr. Eaton Faning, and Mr. Harvey Löhr. One of these pieces (chosen by Miss Thomas) deserves notice.

The pre-eminent composer and first pianist in Europe, Rubinstein, has given to the world what he calls an "Etude sur les fausses notes," a peculiar title, seeing that false notes must, of necessity, offend every sensitive ear. Musicians who ought to know better sometimes speak of "false fifths" (such as the skip from G to C sharp, downwards, in the overture to Auber's opera "Haydée," produced at the Opéra Comique in 1848, and subsequently represented, in motley English dress, at the Royal Italian Opera during the recess, a year afterwards, when Mrs. Sims Reeves made her début on the stage in the title-part).

To revert to the pianoforte piece of Rubinstein. The "Study" of Rubinstein is in C major, and appears well adapted to show off the "genius" of a grand pianoforte, if not remarkable as music. The principal feature of the piece consists in arpeggio runs of demisemiquavers, with constant crossing of the hands, a favourite device of this composer. The episode in C minor, where intervals of thirds and sixths are used, with a rapid flight of octaves, will hardly be thought so pleasing as the arpeggios. A queer arpeggio chord at the outset, where a C natural is added to the intervals of the dominant of the relative A minor, rather grates on the ear, and other crudities might possibly be noticed by microscopic eyes.

THE BURNS FESTIVAL AT THE ALBERT HALL.

The anniversary of Burns's birth was commemorated on Thursday, January 25th, both at St. James's and the Royal Albert Halls. At South Kensington, as may be supposed à priori, Scottish airs and part-songs were the staple of the entertainment; but in the second part of the concert the "Garden Scene" of Gounod's "Faust" was acted in costume on the platform, with Mdme. Marie Roze as Margherita, Mr. Vernon Rigby as Faust, and Mr. Barrington Foote as Mephistopheles. The music was well executed, and Mdme. Marie Roze sang with her usual brilliancy; but the hall, long before the termination of the concert, presented the appearance, not of an audience in session, intent and interested, but a processional "stampede" of women, young, old, and mediæval, heedless of the gross slight that they offered to the artists by turning their backs upon the stage, and only anxious to block up the doorways outside until their vehicles drew up. This nuisance is complained of everywhere, and surely it might be abated if the managers would do their duty. English audiences, as a rule, behave worse than savages; they not only insult the performers, but annoy attentive and well-bred visitors. Selfishness is predominant.

The miscellaneous part of the concert, in Part I afforded scope for the vocal display of Mr. W. Carter's Choir, with the Misses Badia, P. Winter, and Le Brun, Mdme. Enriquez, Mdme. Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Sauvage, and Mr. B. Foote. An interesting item of this part to musicians was the violin fantasia (on Scottish airs) of Mr. Poznanski, whose full, rich, and round tone asserted the value of every note—and notes not a few—in the furthest corner of the hall. The mechanism, too, was wonderful, and the "harmonics" worthy of Paganini himself. Mr. Poznanski's success may be reported as decisive.

MISS MEYNELL'S CONCERT.

Miss Ida Meynell, a young lady with a pleasing mezzo-soprano voice, held a soirée on Tuesday at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush. Miss Meynell introduced a new and pretty song by Mr. George Asch, called "Hide and Seek," accompanied by the composer, which won, and is safe in the future to win, public favour. A second success was achieved in "A Wayside Posy" by Mr. Watson. Mdme. Isabella Powers distinguished herself in Jackman's "At Vespers," and the same composer's "Now or Never." Miss Alice Kean sang Hutchison's "Ehren on the Rhine," and "Lilla's a Lady." Herr Schuberth, the conductor of the concert, gratified the audience with his own violoncello solo "Ave Maria," and pieces by Tours and Berenger.

THE "PEOPLE'S" ENTERTAINMENT SOCIETY.

At a concert held last Saturday evening at the Drill Hall, Bermondsey, by Mdme. Julie Pelletier and Mr. Thorman's Concert Company, this lady sang Mr. Van Noorden's "Yet" and "The Old Folks" of Foster, which won a bis, whereupon "Home, sweet home" was substituted. Mdme. Pelletier also took part in duets and quartets with invariable success. To Miss Alice Parry is due the reintroduction of C. E. Horn's beautiful, but neglected, setting of Herrick's old song "Cherry ripe" in E flat, which was streperously encored. Mr. Manton and Mr. Thorman assisted, and Mr. Harvey Löhr was at the pianoforte.

GLASGOW.

The production of Gounod's "Redemption," on Jan. 23, was successfully effected, the vocalists being Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss H. Wilson, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley, with members of the Choral Union. The manner in which the work was rendered was highly creditable to all parties concerned, but the impression made by the work itself was meagre enough. Portions of it are pretty, and other parts rise to a considerable pitch of power, but of real sublimity, as exhibited in Mendelssohn and Handel, etc., there was a disappointing deficiency. The conclusion arrived at by most of the critics who noticed its original production seems to hold good, for no one need doubt that "Faust" will survive when the "Redemption" is forgotten.

Concerts have recently been given by "The Glasgow Select Choir," Mr. Lambeth's Choir, and the "Govanhill Musical Association," while many others are in prospect. The Govanhill Musical Association concert, under the conductorship of Mr. William Stobs, was moderately successful. The programme consisted of sacred and secular pieces by good composers, but the singing generally was commonplace, if not vulgar. Of the vocalists, the soprano who sang "With verdure clad" was most enjoyable: she has a peculiarly brilliant, if somewhat uncultivated voice. A tenor also sang with much taste, though his style is open to objection on the score of want of culture. The society is new, and improvement will probably come in time.

J. B.

ASHFORD.

The Ashford Choral Society gave their first concert on January 25th. The works performed were, Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Bennett's "May Queen," intersected by a group of four solos by the principal singers—Miss Kate Hardy, R.A.M., Mrs. Brooks, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, R.A.M. The accompaniments were rendered upon the pianoforte and harmonium in combination; but it is to be hoped that so notable a start as this concert proved to be, will end in the establishment of an orchestra. The pianoforte accompaniments of Miss Welldon, a non-professional lady, were indeed most excellent, displaying much artistic judgment, a sensitive touch, and very delicate tact. Miss Kate Hardy sang her parts with great artistic power and much charm; and her solo, Weber's scena "Softly sighs," created a marked sensation. Mrs. Brooks, a local singer, was an efficient mezzo and contralto, singing Sullivan's "Guinevere" with much taste and in good style. Messrs. Sidney Tower and Musgrove Tufnail were in every way artistic and effective. It would be difficult to name a more efficient rendering of the solo parts of the "May Queen" than the performance of this occasion. The chorus acquitted themselves most creditably, showing special care in matters of light and shade, producing some effective crescendo passages, and singing generally with such care, enthusiasm, and good attack as not only evidenced painstaking training, but gave much promise of future excellence in whatever the society may undertake. It should be added that a large and discriminating audience found good reason for encoring all the solo singers by turns, and duly recognised the earnest efforts of the choral force. Mr. Alfred Legg, the parish church organist, conducted with much care and zeal, and displayed such good qualities of leadership as will doubtless be advantageously employed in the future career of the society. It was gratifying to note in Ashford the presence of so much musical intelligence and enthusiasm, both of performers and listeners.

FINSBURY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

On Thursday, the 25th ult., the Finsbury Choral Association gave a performance of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" and selections from the "Elijah" in the Wesleyan Chapel, Old Kent-road. The soprano solos were sung by Miss Fusselle, a pupil of Madame Sainton-Dolby. This young lady possesses a voice of great purity and freshness; she sings with the refinement and taste of an intelligent artist, and may expect a prosperous future. Miss Jennie Rosse sang the contralto music. Mr. Newth, as an amateur, sang the tenor solos with much care and effect; he has a pleasing though not a powerful voice.

Mr. Vaughan Edwardes is to be congratulated upon his successful appearance before a London audience. This gentleman, we understand, is a student at the Royal Academy of Music; he already gives evidence of the advantages of artistic training, and is the fortunate owner of a rich baritone voice. His rendering of the air, "Lord God of Abraham," created a marked impression. With perseverance and care, Mr. Edwardes has the clear prospect of a successful career.

The choruses were, on the whole, rendered with the precision and effect for which this association has established its character. Mr. J. P. Harding accompanied on the organ with judgment and skill; and Mr. C. J. Dale conducted with his usual ability.

We notice that on the 8th February the "Daughter of Jairus" and "Stabat Mater" are to be given in the Holloway Hall by the association. Particulars will be found in our advertising columns.

Sutton, Surrey.—Mr. G. C. Burry's second concert of the season was given in the Public Hall, on Monday last, and drew together the elite of the neighbourhood. The scheme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and an operatic selection for second part of concert. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Coward, and Mr. Hanson. The orchestra consisted of about 30 members. Mr. G. C. Burry's choir did justice to the choral part of the programme. The inhabitants of the locality may be congratulated on being enabled to hear such performances.

Salisbury.—The Salisbury Vocal Union gave their first concert of the season on Monday, the 29th January, in the Hamilton Hall, when A. R. Gaul's sacred cantata "Ruth" was given. The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, Misses Sutton, Wheeler, and Mr. Charles Kelsey. The work was exceedingly well performed by all concerned, and well received. The second part of the programme was devoted to a miscellaneous selection, the soloists being Miss Jones, Mrs. Hayden, and Mr. Kelsey. A special feature of the concert was a harp solo, finely played by Mr. Goslett. Miss Harding and Mr. Luxton ably presided at the pianoforte and organ, and Mr. John M. Hayden conducted. There was a large audience, and the concert was a great success.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

Mr. Willing's Choir gave Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at their second concert on Jan. 30th. The chief singers were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Coward, Miss J. Rosse, Mdme. Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd, A. James, Chaplin Henry, and F. King. The band was of the best quality and well balanced; and the chorus showed many signs of enthusiasm as well as tokens of good training. Mr. Willing was, of course, the conductor.

THE MUSIC OF NATURE.

There is something inexpressibly sad in the bare aspect of the trees that stand like mammoth harps, upon whose strings of branch and twig the wind plays dirges to its victims—the fallen leaves, which lie about in heaps of brown unhappiness, emitting a doleful crackle as I pass over them. To draw again from the well of figurative language, how like untuned instruments are the trees! Tuned were they by April and May; the summer months produced from them a rich melody of green; but it was not until touched by October's skilful hand that the responsive leaf-keys brought forth their exquisite harmonies of color, each modulation of which was attended with some new and striking beauty. Now the foliage key-board is destroyed, and nothing but the framework that contained it remains; let us console ourselves, however, by the reflections that a new key-board will be provided, and that the process of re-tuning the trees is delayed only till the arrival of the tuner Spring, under whose influence shall they, in company with the grass and flowers, shoot bud and blossom into tune, preparatory to giving forth their hymn of loveliness, beneath the control of another summer and autumn.

How closely allied are color and tone! the spectrum from red to violet corresponds to the scale, from its lowest to highest sounds, in that various tints and shades coincide with whole and semi-tones; we are constantly borrowing phrases from each to apply to the other, and indeed so interdependent are they, that with many persons the letters of the musical alphabet are mentally colored, so that their hues become incorporated with the tones they represent to such a degree that when listening to a composition the combination of letters suggested by moving harmonies present to these individuals a fabric of mingled dyes, that form with the music a double panorama, adding greatly to their enjoyment. Whether this matter of coloring a tone is exclusively dependent upon its letter, the writer, owing to limited investigations, is unable to determine. There may be those to whom musical sounds, independent of letters, convey color, but in any case a development of the subject would no doubt show many curious phases and prove of no small interest.

Yes, the days of melancholy music are come. The great music-caterer, Nature, has nothing but sadness to offer. Her prima-donnas have flown to fulfil engagements made by their concert-manager, the South, while her insect violinists that have charmed us through the summer with delightful matinées and soirées, have ceased to draw the bow, and even her mighty thunder-drum is silent.

Is the northern portion of her choir and orchestra, then, disbanded? By no means. New and different performers are being introduced upon the stage of Time to supply the places of those withdrawn, and another movement in a minor key of her wondrous symphony has begun; warblers of less note appear, to take less prominent parts, and piccolos and whistles are added to the wind-instruments, for which snow-accompaniments are speedily promised.

The music of Nature is gradually assuming a colder character, becoming more strict and rigid in harmonic treatment and less emotional, but welcome still. We should ever be content to listen to what our all-mother provides, for only by so doing can we appreciate those attributes of the Master Composer, presented by the music of his interpreter.

What lessons teachers of Art may learn from this grand interpretation of God, in which expression and technique are so beautifully and sublimely blended as to thrill the soul with awed delight! Here is no preponderance of the one over the other, as is so often the case in man's vocal and instrumental performances. Whatever of this melodious knowledge is borne into consciousness breathes of the coalition of divinity and its technical presentation. Let all musicians follow the glorious example thus afforded, and seek in performing to combine soul and executive ability, for it is only the right blending of these qualities that electrifies an audience and wins a shrine in the temple of Fame.—Henry W. Stration, in the Musical Record, U.S.A.

THE MUSICAL STANDARD

LONDON: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1883.

FRIEDRICH FREIKERR VON FLOTOW.

ANOTHER prominent figure has been removed from the musical world by the death at Wiesbaden on January 24th of Flotow. This eminent leader of the second-class German opera school was born in 1811, or, some more definitely assert, on April 27th, 1812, at a small town in Mecklenburgh-Schwerin. As a member of a noble family, he studied and practised music as a lover, rather than as a professional follower of the art. In pursuance of his father's wish that he should prepare himself for the diplomatic service, he proceeded to Paris to complete his education and to attain experience in the chief seat of the political world. However, he soon commenced the study of music under Reicha, and subsequently spent much of his time in the French capital, where indeed a good many of his works were first heard. Flotow's first essay on the lyric stage was "Pierre et Colombine," produced in 1832. This was followed by "Rob Roy" and "La Duchesse de "Guise." His first solid success as an operatic composer appears to have been secured by "Noufrage de la Méduse," written for the Théatre de la Renaissance (1839); "L'Esclave de Camoens (Paris, 1843), and "L'Ombre," produced at the Opéra Comique in 1869, were also received with great applause. His most popular work, "Martha," was given for the first time at Vienna in 1847, and soon made its composer famous all the world over. An Italian version was brought out at Covent Garden in 1858. In Germany, says the Times, its popularity continues unabated, and only a few days ago Herr Botel, a tenor, and, like WACHTEL, a former coachman, made a sensational début as "Lionel" at Hamburg. The work which stands second in popularity if not in merit to "Martha" is "Allessandro Stradella," originally an operetta written for the Palais Royal, in 1837, and remodelled as an opera in 1844, when it was produced at Hamburg and received with the most rapturous applause. "Stradella" was given in English at Drury Lane (1846), and in Italian at Covent Garden (1864), but it failed here to secure the success generally accorded to it on the Continent. Of his other works must be mentioned "Indra," "Rubezahl," "Marie "Katerina," "Le Forestier" (1840); "L'Ame en "Peine" (in 1846), played in English at the Princess's Theatre as "Leoline" in 1848; "Die Matrosen," about 1859; "Albin," 1856; and "Le Veuve Grossier," produced at the Bouffes Parisiens in the autumn of 1852. In 1854 FLOTOW accepted office as Intendant of the Court Theatre in Schwerin; continuing to hold this appointment until 1863. The incidental music to Dinglestedt's version of "A Winter's Tale," an opéra-bouffe in one act, "La Veuve Grapin," written for the theatre of his friend Offenbach, "Zilda," 1866; and a few occasional compositions were the comparatively small results of the seven years he spent at Scherwin. In 1864 FLOTOW was elected corresponding member of the Institut de France.

It has been the fashion to treat FLOTOW's talents and acquirements with much less consideration than they deserve. As a melodist, and melody is now too often all but absent from even works of large pretensions, FLOTOW had abundant powers, combining the pure vocalisms of the Italian school with the vivacity and piquancy of the French opera. The Daily Telegraph critic, who speaks decidedly with regard to the advanced school says: "Musical innovators are ad- "dicted to saying that the fountain of tune is dried "up. They show us that the notes of our scale con- "tain only a certain number of permutations now "practically exhausted, and go on to contend that "reliance must be placed on other sources opened up "by modern development. The man who cannot "discover the fountain, and comes before the world "with an empty pitcher, proclaims that the waters "have run dry, in order to cover his confusion. Let "us not listen to him, at any rate when looking on "FLOTOW's grave. The stream is running still for "those who have the grace to find it, and when some "great singer arises—a singer like MOZART or MEN- "DELSSOHN—whose pure strains well forth from a "natural source—

> 'As effortless as woodland nooks
> Send violets up and paint them blue,'

"an end will be put to all the fantastic notions that "now, under various high-sounding names, try to dis- "tract attention from the rents and rags of artistic "poverty. Meanwhile, the danger is that our young "musicians in whom a gift of melody may develop "itself will be drawn aside from its proper cultivation "in order to become 'tone-painters' and so forth. "It is so cheap to fall in with tendencies that have an "imposing terminology, that are vaunted as based "upon philosophy, and talked about rapturously, if "understood dimly, in the circles of the 'advanced.'"

It was the mission of FLOTOW to show the healthy, refreshing power of tune, and his memory will not be overlooked, even though he aspired not to revolution and mysticism. His work, indeed, was characterised by the general absence of pretension and effort, and by the presence of naturalness and spontaneity. Though FLOTOW composed a fair amount of chamber music of various kinds, he did not succeed in what may be called the severer forms of the art, perhaps in part because he did not find cause to work with sufficient intensity, viewing the art with something of the ease of the distinguished amateur, even though he really loved its pursuit after his own fashion and in pleasant places. The now old-fashioned feature of an opera, a regularly constructed overture, FLOTOW succeeded in writing with some success, his best effort in this direction being, perhaps, the overture to "Stradella," which, however, is not without weak points, though the beauty of its introductory movement is undeniable; again, his overture to "Martha," with its intermingled graceful, and vivacious sentences, is worthy of the pen of AUBER. FLOTOW made no pretensions to contrapuntal skill, but his harmonies are well chosen, judicious, and effective. His orchestration is clear, bright, and appropriate, with now and then artistic touches of no ordinary power. His chef d'œuvre, in popular estimation, "Martha," will live, and it is not impossible that "Stradella," and some other specimens from his genial pen, will again be tried, and perhaps will once more meet with a measure of success.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

II.

CHERUBINI commences his observations on Four-part Counterpoint by briefly setting forth the abatement of the severity of the laws governing the composition of counterpoint as the number of the employed parts is increased. He points out that the classical composers particularly PALESTRINA, indulged in such relaxations from the rules as seem at first sight to reveal actual faults, or at least to indicate a tendency in the direction of too much license. Now, though it is unnecessary to again enter the question as to the power of the composer to supplement "strength" by that wise "freedom" which is indeed a second strength, it may be well to remark that the greatest of practical contrapuntists, as such typical writers as PALESTRINA and BACH, did wisely elect to accept the spirit rather than the letter of the law, and chose to regard rules as merely means to an end—that of pure, strong writing. At the same time let the student remember that such freedom does not belong to any preparatory stage of his contrapuntal career when it is his business to train his musical thoughts, but to his artistic manhood, when he applies his scholastic attainments without pedantic restraint to the real life-work of the composer. It is fitting here to repeat a regret more than once expressed—that CHERUBINI's examples do not always illustrate or even observe the rules he sets forth so logically; and it is further to be regretted that the different standard works on Counterpoint, ancient and modern, present many examples in which "freedom" prevails to the prejudice of such law-abiding principles as would best train the ear and eye of the student in the art of building up accurately grammatical progressions. This, be it understood, is not said from any love of pedantry, but from an earnest belief that the best and shortest road to the attainment of contrapuntal strength and independence is by the seemingly narrow, but safe pathway of law-abiding conscientiousness, by which the student can alone fortify his mind with the experience of centuries of theoretical knowledge and practical skill. An exhortation to prefer laws to licenses should meet the student's eye as a balance to the statement of the privileged abatement of the severity of the rules by reason of the increased difficulties of movement to be encountered in the throng of an increasingly crowded score. The Florentine theorist now explains in accordance with the remarks made in the article preceding the present one, that the chords $\frac{5}{3}$ and $\frac{6}{3}$, being $\frac{}{1}$ $\frac{}{1}$ composed of three harmonic elements only, it is necessary to double one of these elements in four-part counterpoint. In the chords $\frac{5}{3}$, he continues, all its $\frac{}{1}$ harmonic members may be doubled alternately, according to the position and proximity of the different parts to the different elements of the chord. In the words "the octave and the third should be "doubled more frequently than the unison or fifth," CHERUBINI expresses an opinion which has more force than seems evident at first sight. With regard to the unison, its absorbing effect is a manifest reason against its frequent doubling. With regard to the fifth, it should be noted that its firm, not to say assertive character, should as a rule forbid its being doubled until the root note of the chord has been also doubled; and as the two elements cannot be doubled at once in the same chord in four parts without the entire loss of the third, it is clear that the fifth cannot well be doubled, save exceptionally in four parts. On the whole, too, doubled thirds should be "few and far between," if contrapuntal strength is duly valued; and when doubled in the chord $\frac{5}{3}$ $\frac{}{1}$ should be duplicated, if possible, in the second and third octaves above the bass note and fundamental sound of the chord, so as to endorse the natural scheme of the harmonic range. The theorist adds, "If one or other of the chords $\frac{5}{3}$ or $\frac{6}{3}$ be employed $\frac{}{1}$ $\frac{}{1}$ "in an incomplete form which is occasionally permitted, "and which is often indispensably necessary—it is then "requisite to double two of their harmonic elements, or "even to triple one of them, an expedient to which "recourse should be had only in perplexing situations." The student should strive to avoid using two or more incomplete chords in succession, and endeavour as a rule to present concordant combinations in such way as to secure not only complete but well distributed harmonies.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM FOR INDIA.

The subject of the translation of the National Anthem into the languages of India has lately evoked much interesting criticism in the English journals. A number of obstacles to be surmounted by the committee which has undertaken the work have been paraded before the British public, and many a dilemma created, on either horn of which impalement has been prophesied. To one well acquainted with the character and genius of the Indian people, and the aims of the committee in question, these fears and apprehensions are as much a subject of amusement as the terrors inspired by giants and monsters inhabiting that terra incognita which imaginative nurses have the privilege of describing to their juvenile charges.

A brief resumé of these objections and obstacles may be instructive. It has been observed, "that, whereas throughout Europe one Supreme Being is acknowledged as GOD, in India each racial division has its particular gods, abominating the divinities worshipped by the others." Now, the leading sects of India deriving their doctrines from the Vedas (and they are by far the greater portion of the Indian people) are the Smarthas, Sivas, and Vaishnavas. There are sub-divisions of each of them with trivial differences. These sects all acknowledge the one thousand and eight names of GOD, which form simply an amplified list of the names of the three-fold division of the GODHEAD: BRAHMA, VISHNU, and SIVA. A careful study of these names will prove that they mean but one Supreme Being. The Vedas distinctly say, "GOD is Brahma, Siva, Indra, The Immutable, The Supreme, The Self-Existent Sovereign of the Universe." But it may be contended that these are truths realised and appreciated only by the learned, and that the people have no distinct idea of the unity of GOD.

Let us examine the folk-lore of India, or more especially of Southern India.

Thayumanavar, whose poems, though mainly of a spiritual character, are yet as popular among the Tamils as those of Burns are among the British people, says: "Adoration be to GOD—of whom it is impossible to say He is there or here—who is the perfection of beatitude and mercy, who is above all doctrinal differences, about whom the innumerable sects of the world contend in the words 'He is our GOD, and not yours.'" The Avivotha Voonthyan, which is a very popular Tamil lyric, says: "We don't care what sect it is; every sect that reveals the GODHEAD is a true sect." The writings of the well-known Telugu poet Vemana, whose verses are quoted by thousands every day in the country, abound in similar sentiments. These three are but a few out of a great body of eminent writers on the religious folk-lore of the country; and need it be pointed out that the folk-lore of a country is but a mirror that reflects the leading ideas and principles of the people?

In brief, the Indian people are cognizant of simple and sublime truths about the GODHEAD, irrespective of the sectarian differences and theological hostilities that abound in their country, as in every other part of the world, where intellectual ability has been a co-existent factor of religious faith.

The most ordinary term in Tamil for GOD is "DEVAN," a form of the Sanskrit word "DEVA," which, according to the authority of philologists, is the root of the Greek "Theos" and the Latin "Deus." The Telugu form of the word is "DEVUDU." To say that though the word DEVA is used by the missionaries working in India it is practically unknown to the vast mass of the people, is an opinion evidently based upon incorrect information.

These terms are in common use among the people of Southern India, as the word "ISVARA" is in the North; and all these terms convey exactly the same meaning as the English words "GOD" or "THE LORD."

Next comes the question of the adaptation of the music of the Anthem. All comparative knowledge of music apart, it may be asked: "Suppose an air is played or sung to a foreign people, and they like it and express their delight in unreserved terms, will it not recommend itself to them if the words to which it is sung should be translated into their own language or dialect?" The people in the Southern part of India, of whom we may speak from personal experience, already appreciate the air of the Anthem; and why should it not be popular among them if the words are given in their own language?

Some have gone to the length of suggesting that the ideas in the Anthem are foreign to the people of India. In reply, it may be averred that for almost every idea or sentiment in it, a corresponding one may be cited in the literature of the Indian people.

Another oft-repeated query has been, "Will an anthem manufactured for the people of India by the British public recommend itself to them?" This query loses sight of the very peculiar relations at present subsisting between India and England. The two nations, or, as some would put it, the nationalities inhabiting India, and the people of Britain, form one empire under one sovereign; and there are many things, whether social, or political, or literary, in which they may with mutual advantage help each other. The propounders of the query have only to abide the event; for, if the enthusiasm with which the movement has already been greeted in the Indian Empire is not counted sufficient evidence, the actual reception of the Anthem when it shall have been translated into the Indian languages, will, we may rest assured, dispel any doubts yet lingering in their minds as to the ultimate success of the endeavours of the Anthem Committee.

It has been urged "that though the domiciled English people and our regimental bands have been singing and playing the National Anthem and other music for the last hundred years in the country, not a single melody has been retained, nor any portion of our musical system adopted by the Hindoos." But, as a matter of fact, the people of India have adopted more of the music of England than people in England are aware of. At almost every procession in leading cities of Southern India, people who can afford it employ bands of Eurasians who play English music. These bands have become so much in vogue that now it would be counted as detracting from the importance of the event not to employ them. It need hardly be pointed out that these bands often conclude with "God Save the Queen." The fiddle, which is so popular in India at present, is purely an English or European instrument; and the English tunes which Indian fiddlers play, and often so admirably, are applauded by enthusiastic audiences in a manner which speaks volumes for the appreciation of European music by the people of India. It must further be added, that this taste for European music has been and is steadily growing.

These remarks sufficiently show that the ground in India for the reception of the National Anthem is fully prepared.

MUSICAL OBITUARY FOR 1882.

From the scattered notices in periodical literature, of deceased musicians, few people would form any idea of the annual "bill of mortality" in this profession; but when anything like a complete list is made out, the total assumes alarming proportions. Having, during the past year, noted all the deaths advertised or referred to in the English and some foreign publications, I think the following table will possess some interest (of a mournful nature) for the readers of the Musical Standard. The list does not, of course, pretend to anything like absolute completeness or correctness, but it is the nearest attempt at such yet made. In many cases conflicting dates have been given, and such instances have, wherever possible, been corrected by reference to advertisements; in other cases it has been quite impossible to ascertain the day, while even the month is sometimes matter of conjecture. In addition to the following, deaths have occurred of relatives; but, without evidence of such belonging to the profession, I have not thought it advisable or proper to insert their names.

Rouzaud, husband of Christine Nilsson, February 23; Marquis de Pontécoulant, writer on musical history, etc. (February); the Earl of Wilton, at Melton Mowbray, aged 82, March 7; Louis Désiré Lejeune, amateur violinist, whose house at Antwerp was the resort of the greatest artists, aged 83 (March); Sir Henry Cole, at South Kensington, aged 73 (April); Lady Charles Bertie Percy, at Guy's Cliff, Warwick, June 11, aged 77, known as the Hon. Mrs. Bertie Percy, as a song composer; Cecil G. Lawson, the painter (June); Ernest Boieldieu, nephew of the great composer (June); Richard B. Barton, barrister, and well known as a musical amateur.

Among the trades connected with music organ building occupies an important position. The following organ builders have died during the year:—George Jardine, at New York, February 10, aged 82; Pietro Barchetto, at Turin (April); S. R. Warren, at Toronto, Canada, July 30; Luigi Lingiardi, of Padua (Sept.), aged 68. Pianoforte makers; Raffaele Federico, of Naples (January), aged 28; G. A. Challenger, London, February 4, aged 53; John Allison, London, February 9, aged 51; Haydn Collard, London, March 9, aged 75; William Porter Dreaper, Liverpool, April 13; John Marr, Aberdeen, November 10. Williams, May 12, aged 73; Barnett, Samuel, head of the firm of Barnett Samuel & Sons, June 13, aged 62; John Hyam, London, June 23; Otto Herold, bell founder, Komotau, Bohemia (September); Paolo Maisco, Milan (October), aged 79; Alex. Gutheil, publisher, at Moscow (December); and Pierre Louis Gauthrot, Paris (December).

In the above I have, when it could be ascertained, added the age (always counting completed years), and some instruction might be deduced from the varying figures—19 to 97! What promising careers have been cut off! And in how many instances the idea that musicians are short-lived is proved fallacious. Leaving all further speculations to such of your readers as may have the leisure and inclination to indulge in them, I will only express the hope that this compilation may be useful for reference, as well as interesting for the lessons that may be drawn therefrom.

Correspondence.

"THE CREATION."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In the notice of "The Creation," in your last issue, the writer remarks, "It may be thought odd that Haydn has made Adam, who here appears as a married lover, a basso (or baritone) instead of a tenor." There is a statement on the authority of Signora Storace, that when Haydn was engaged in the composition of "The Creation," he was on terms of friendship with a bass singer of great excellence, for whom he wrote the part—this owing chiefly to the fact that there was no tenor of any eminence in Vienna at the time.

Yours faithfully,
STEPHEN S. STRATTON.

REFRESHMENT BARS AND THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—As the Crystal Palace Company takes upon itself the sole management of the forthcoming Handel Festival, the directors will naturally wish to mark the new departure by perfecting the arrangements. Hitherto there has been one terrible annoyance. I refer to the barriers or screens at the transept end of each of the refreshment bars under the orchestra front. In past years they served the admirable purpose of cutting off a large part of the orchestra from the view and hearing of thousands down the nave each way. It would be a trifling matter to remove them, if only temporarily, and the gain would be enormous.

Then, as "refreshments," after all, are not the sole object of life, would it be too presumptuous to suggest that these two particular bars might be closed during the performances on festival days, so that the audience, as well as the band and chorus, might be spared the clatter of spoons, cups, saucers, etc., which, on previous occasions, has formed an "additional accompaniment" not to be found in any score?

Whether it might not be another improvement to depend more on the voices, and less on the brass, is perhaps too delicate a question.

Yours faithfully,
Jan. 27, 1883. EXCELSIOR.

The Musical Review is doing good by calling attention to the generally inferior music of our theatres. It is to be hoped that a reformation, of which signs are not wanting, is at hand in this direction.

Passing Events.

A new oratorio by Richard Hol, called "David," has been heard and favourably criticised in Amsterdam.

The Queen has been graciously pleased to accept the position of Patroness of the Leeds Musical Festival.

Miss Annie Glen gave her first evening concert on January 25th, at the Steinway Hall.

Le Guide Musical has a word to say about the late John Crowdy.

The Emperor of Germany has bestowed the Red Order of the Eagle on the composer Barziel.

L'Avenir Musicale (the organ of the Gallin-Paris-Chevé system) is translating Mr. J. S. Curwen's "Musical Notes in Paris."

Hand and Heart for February contains an appreciative account of Mr. W. H. Jude, with a portrait of that talented Liverpool organist.

A French journal, Le Parnasse, has opened a competition for the best libretto of a comic opera in three or more acts.

At the Vienna Court Opera during the past year 74 operas, by 33 composers, were given, representing the performances of 219 evenings.

A "Sportsman's Exhibition" is being held, until February 10th, at the Agricultural Hall. The music of the chase will probably not be overlooked in the scheme.

Household Words for February contains an article "On the Composition of an Orchestra," which gives, in a familiar, simple style, a brief description of the different instruments, with some of their leading effects.

A new musical society, called the Eccles District Vocal Union, has just been established in Eccles for the encouragement of part-singing in that locality. Mr. R. Froude Coules, organist to the Earl of Mulgrave, has been appointed musical director.

The Brixton Choral and Orchestral Society will give, on Monday next, Henry Gasby's "The Lord of the Isles." The leader of the band will be Mr. F. Decker, the organist Mr. W. E. Stark, and the conductor Mr. William Lemare.

An important selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at St. Paul's Cathedral on January 25th (Conversion of St. Paul), in accordance with an excellent annual custom. The employment of the orchestra is a happy characteristic from year to year of this notable service.

Mr. Richard Ling, for many years the respected organist of St. Alphage, London Wall, died recently. Mr. Ling was a well-known amateur musician, the friend of many artists, and an earnest lover of organ music and good organs, having sound judgment upon matters musical.

A concert was given on Monday evening at the Shoreditch Town Hall under the patronage of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts in aid of the organ fund for St. Peter's, Hoxton Square. The vocalists included Mdme. Edith Wynne and Mr. Vernon Rigby; Mr. John Thomas was the harpist.

On Jan. 27th, Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was well given, under the conductorship of Mr. W. McNaught, at the Bow and Bromley Institute. Mr. W. Hodge was the very able organist, displaying in his solos of the miscellaneous part much artistic power and skill. A very large audience attended the performance.

At Mr. Henry Holmes's "musical evening" of the 24th, at the R.A.M. Rooms, Brahms's Quintet for strings Op. 88, was performed. A pretty general verdict was that the work, like other compositions by the same hand, is overwrought, and some say wanting in genuine inspiration and freshness of thought. The quintet consists of three divisions—an allegro non troppo, ma con brio; a following movement, with changes of tempo and rhythm and of the mixed character of a slow movement and a scherzo; and a final allegro energico, culminating in a presto. Beethoven's "Kreutzer's Sonata" and Mozart's Quartet in D (No. 10) were also performed upon this occasion.

Queries.

Beethoven's Symphonies.—Can anyone inform me where I could obtain the description of Beethoven's Symphonies by Dr. George Grove (mentioned on page 56 of the Musical Standard), also the title of the pamphlet? May I also ask if the final parts of Dr. Hand's "Musical Æsthetics" are in course of publication?—An Enquirer.

Fundamental Chords and Discords.—Will any of your readers kindly tell me what are meant by fundamental chords and fundamental discords, what chords these two classes include, and name any text-book that thoroughly explains the above?—Student.

TRIADS: THEIR RELATIONSHIP AND TREATMENT.

By Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus.Doc.

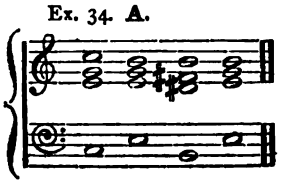
It has been seen that the most natural, and therefore the smoothest, progressions from triad to triad are those in which the root of one is a fifth, or a fourth, above or below the other, and those in which the roots descend a third:—

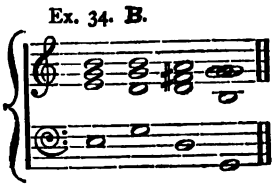
Ex. 33.

The progression from one chord to another having its root a third above has, however, a good effect when the second chord is made the stepping-stone to a new key:—

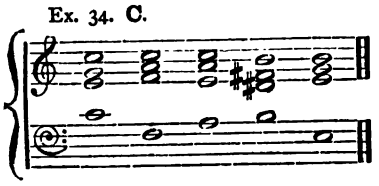
Ex. 34. A.



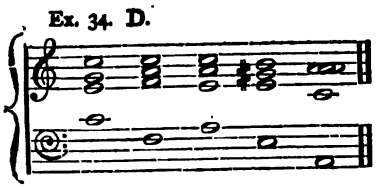
Ex. 34. B.



Ex. 34. C.



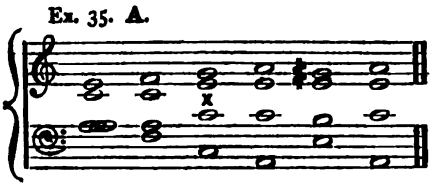
Ex. 34. D.



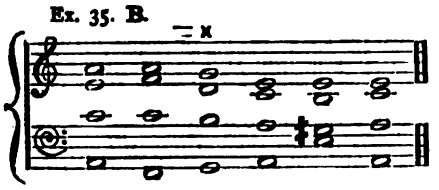
In fact, it may be stated as a rule that, if we move from one chord to another whose root is a third lower, we shall find it easy to re-establish the tonality from which for the moment we are straying, whilst in the opposite case, i.e., when the root of the 2nd chord is a third above the 1st, we shall obtain a better result by modulating to some scale in which it appears as the tonic or "sub-dominant."

It will doubtless have been observed that in the choice of chords we are more restricted in the minor than in the major key, and from this cause many of the difficulties which beset the student of harmony and counterpoint arise. The similarity in appearance between most of the intervals of relative major and minor scales frequently leads to confusion between the chords properly belonging to each. If we would avoid vague and indefinite tonality, it will always be well not to introduce into the minor key a chord peculiar to the relative major scale, unless it is our intention to make a modulation to the latter key, in which case the intruding chord should be followed by some chord or chords derived from the major scale. Herein lies a noteworthy difference between the major and minor modes. We have seen that it is possible to use two minor chords in succession in the major key without material disturbance of the tonality. In the minor key, however, it appears to be a fact that two major chords in succession produce an effect inconsistent with the sombre character of the scale, and that the sounding of the tonic or dominant harmony of the relative major scale begets an instant craving for the establishment of that key:—

Ex. 35. A.



Ex. 35. B.



In both of these examples there is a laxity in the choice of chords which gives indecision to the effect, and which reminds us of the vague tonality of the old Church modes. In the following examples a transient but clear modulation is made to the relative major:—

Ex. 36. A.

Ex. 36. B.

and the return to the minor key, if less welcome than the departure, is at all events unmistakable. Many irregularities in this and other respects are however justifiable when the parts progress sequentially.

Ex. 37. A.

Ex. 37. B.

Ex. 37. C.

Observe the falling leading note and the good effect of the usually abrupt progression from the chord of E minor to that of F major in the example in the key of C major, the intrusion of the chord of C major into the minor key in the second of the last quoted examples, and the false relation in the third. All these irregularities are introduced in order to carry out the sequences, and although such progressions would be open to criticism if taken separately, in this form they are not only tolerable, but even beautiful.

Hitherto I have discussed only various combinations of triads (or, more properly speaking, of triads having one sound doubled) with the "root," as it is usually called, in the Bass. I must now proceed to the consideration of the inversion of triads. In doing so I must call your attention to a very curious and remarkable acoustical phenomenon, which was first discovered more than a century ago, although Professor Helmholtz seems to have been the first investigator who observed the full importance of its bearing upon practical harmony. I refer to what are known as combinational or resultant tones. No doubt most of you are aware of the fact that, when two adjacent sounds of the harmonic series are sounded together, their combination produces a third sound which has for its vibrational number the difference between the respective vibrational numbers of the primary sounds. Thus, for example, if the two combined sounds make 200 and 300 vibrations respectively in a given time, the resultant sound will make 100 vibrations in the same time. If any one who is not familiar with this fact cares to satisfy himself in regard to it, a very simple experiment will suffice. The tones of a harmonium, or the stopped diapason of an organ, are well adapted for the purpose. Let the two sounds C and F be substituted for F, the C being still retained. A sort of ghost-like bass will be distinctly audible. The first of these additional notes will be the double octave below the F, the second will be the octave below the C. It may be necessary to repeat the experiment several times in the case of an unpractised ear, but when the attention has been properly directed for a little time, the clearness with which these combinational, or resultant, tones come out is astonishing.

We have seen that any note as a generator of harmonics produces first its octave, then its 12th, then its double octave, then the major 3rd above this double octave, and then the octave above its 12th, these six sounds producing a very satisfactory major chord. It must now be noticed that the prominent resultant tone formed by the combination of the first six harmonics will be the generator itself. In fact, the generator produces the harmonics, the harmonics in combination reproduce the generator. The interest attaching to this discovery increases when we observe the effect of the union of three sounds. If the triad on C is sounded in its closest position the resultant tones are respectively one and two octaves below C;

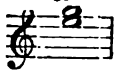
the upper note is produced by the union of C and G; the lower one is doubly caused, first by the union of C with E, next by the union of E with G. Now, if these observations are carried yet further, we find that the first inversion of the same triad produces the same combinational tones as the triad itself with the addition of the 12th above the generator, and that the 2nd inversion produces three repetitions of C, the root: the following example will show this clearly. The triads are written as minims, the resultant tones as crotchets:—

Ex. 38.

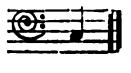
These facts seem to point to the conclusion, which is certainly borne out by our hearing faculties, that a major chord retains its essential characteristics even when its intervals are inverted. Nature's bass (if the expression may be allowed) is still present, although unpractised ears do not readily separate its sounds from the louder notes of the chord with which it mingles. When, however, we turn to examine the combinational tones of a minor triad we find different results. Let me yet once more ask your attention to the harmonic series of sounds arising from C.

You will remember that the minor triad on E was formed by uniting the 10th, 12th, and 15th harmonics. Now, by the law which has been already mentioned, the 10th and 12th harmonics in combination will give us the 2nd harmonic as a resultant tone; that is to say, E and G will produce C.

Ex. 39. A.



Ex. 39. B.



Again, the combination of the 12th with the 15th harmonic will give us the 3rd harmonic, the difference between their numbers being 3.

Thus the major 3rd, G, B,

Ex. 39. C.

will produce the double octave below the G, i.e.

Ex. 39. D.

But the union of E and B,

qualities, together with such powers of prolonged breathing and sustentation of linked sounds as are rarely found in these days, are among the qualities necessary for the development of the rich yet reserved spirituality of the Palestrina school. Such music rebukes the presumption of the dramatic readers of sacred text, and in awe-struck reverential streams of evenly expressed contrapuntal figures, tells us that the task of adequately setting such words may after all be best attained in the devotional forgetfulness of personality and in unpretentious yet strongly built up counterpoint, rather than in the transparent theatrical devices of over-vaulting musical ambition. The reading of Palestrina by the Bach Choir was solid and largely sympathetic, though naturally somewhat wanting in that contemplative power which is largely absent from our modern choirs, trained chiefly under instrumental influences, and which is a large essential in the just rendering of Palestrina's saintly, heaven-born music. The presence of a number of boys' voices lent some sonority and solidity to the upper parts. The chorus singing was of a very high order indeed, tune and general style being alike excellent. Such good qualities were admirably displayed in Wilbye's "Stay, Corydon," and T. Attwood Walmisley's "Sweete Floweres." A recitative and trio from Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's "Ruth" for soprano, contralto and tenor, proved very acceptable, and it might be well to reproduce the entire work. Gade's part-song "Upon the deep blue water," the Swedish volkslied, "How splendid is crystal" (harmonised by Otto Goldschmidt), and Mendelssohn's "The Nightingale" (encored) were capitally rendered. Mdme. Norman-Néruda played two solos of the old world of violin music, a "Larghetto" by Nardini, and a "Tambourin" by Léclair, with pianoforte accompaniment arranged from figured bass by Ferdinand David. A "Sanctus" in C (J. S. Bach), for the first time by this choir, closed the concert. This dignified and masterly piece "formed," said the programme, "an integral part of the Lutheran service at Leipzig, in which it closed the preface to the Communion at the three great annual festivals. Four specimens have been published in full score by the German Bach Society in the volume for the year 1861 (vol. xi); and the first of these is the Sanctus in C, selected for performance this evening; the remaining three being the Sanctus in D major, already performed by the Bach Choir, and two others in D minor and G major respectively. The editor of the German score states that the authenticity of the first and second of these compositions, as by J. S. Bach, is clearly established; but he evidently entertains some doubt with regard to the authorship of the third and fourth." It was given upon this occasion with organ, and it was rendered with much character and power. The conductor was Dr. J. Stainer (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt), who performed his responsible duties with all the requisite tact and judgment. The principal vocalists were Miss Robertson and Mdme. Isabel Fassett, whose singing was very artistic; Messrs. Frost, Kenningham, Tremere, and Thomas Kempton, and their parts were excellently rendered. The accompaniments were given at the pianoforte by Mr. Stephen Kemp, and the organist was Mr. Thomas Pettit. These gentlemen did their work with artistic skill and musicianly judgment.

At the second grand concert, on March 8th, "Odysseus" (scenes from the "Odyssey") for chorus, solo, voices, and orchestra, by Max Bruch, will be performed. This performance, the first in London of the entire work, will be conducted by the composer. There will be a complete professional orchestra.

MDME. VIARD-LOUIS'S LECTURES.

At the meeting of January 31st (held in lieu of January 22nd), Mdms. Viard-Louis delivered, through the medium of her (English) reader, Mrs. Warrington Smyth, a most interesting lecture in continuation of her present suggestive subject—the literature of the pianoforte—and illustrated the text with a programme of sterling music. The lectures comprised the composers who flourished at the beginning of the 19th century. It is contended by Mdme. Viard-Louis that the masters in the art have always been the interpreters of the popular feeling of their own time, and not in advance of their time. At the close of the 18th century two currents were flowing side by side. The upper ranks of society (the "Rose" tribe) wanted pleasure and repose, after the long civil and religious wars of Europe, but the "Third Estate" demanded liberty, and the storm of revolution broke out with fury. Thus the last works of Mozart were separated by a few years only from the maturity of Beethoven, and these two masters may be considered as types of the two currents above mentioned. Mozart had been spoken of in a previous discourse as the unrivalled songster of the privileged classes; and in Beethoven it is all humanity that sings or weeps. "And here we may stop, for the art of music has nothing more to desire. It has its Homer, its Dante, its Michael Angelo, Virgil, and Raffaelle; and yet more, for we must ascend to the Sacred Prophets themselves to find again expression of truth and feeling so divine and yet so human."

But if this second Ezekiel dominates over his epoch, there is a powerful army about him, preceding and accompanying their leader and general.

Handel had written his oratorios; Gluck had raised lyrical tragedy to an altitude until then unknown; and vocal music of greatest excellence had prepared the way for the advent of symphony, of a far higher order than had yet appeared. Beethoven came, after Haydn and Mozart, to make of the symphony Jacob's ladder, the summit of which should reach to heaven and the infinite. And under the pressure brought about by the development of thought, instruments were invented more adequate to the aspirations of the art. The "Hammer-Clavier," or modern pianoforte, now appeared, although very inferior to the magnificent instruments manufactured in the present day. After remarking how imperfectly great men like Beethoven were understood in their own life-time, and how few eminent geniuses spring from the higher class of society—as if poverty and suffering braced and strengthened the soul—the lecturer said that whatever she might hope she was unable to understand how the art of music could advance higher still. An opinion was also expressed that Beethoven, Weber, and Mendelssohn, lofty geniuses, and men of "wonderful talents," such as Hummel and Schubert, had never been surpassed.

Mdme. Viard-Louis proceeded to speak of writers for the modern pianoforte, who, although not stars of the first magnitude have yet rendered good service to the art. Daniel Steibelt, famous for his "Storm" rondo (which she afterwards played), had a great reputation in his day (1765—1823). The reporter remembers that 57 years ago this piece was in the portfolio of every lady amateur that could play at all, and all the artists throughout Europe produced it. Steibelt created the (terribly absurd) "genre" of "Variations." J. P. Hummel (1778—1837) was spoken of at length, and his biography carefully epitomised. Hummel's style was a mixed one; as a composer, he is certainly great; a "power" in music, with plentitude of means and richness of combination, his relative inferiority is caused by Beethoven's immense poetic power. Hummel never rises to the point of making the pianoforte speak. The "Fantaisie," Op. 18 (played by the lecturer) cannot be considered a "tone-poem." There are to be found in it dramatic power, exquisite grace, passionate agitation, and well-defined improvisation; but all stops short of perfection; one never forgets the piano, the performer, and the composer. Hummel's inferiority to his gigantic contemporary is radical.

Weber had already been extolled. Mdme. Viard-Louis, like most learned musicians, considers this master's genius essentially operatic and orchestral; it is clearly typified by "Der Freischütz." The 3rd sonata in D minor, Op. 49 (played in illustration), reminds Mdme. Viard-Louis of the opera-house and orchestral combinations.

Schubert recalls, in his music, the remembrance of some past emotion. The lecturer, making Schubert much below Beethoven and Weber, nevertheless esteems all his works as of a high order. Mdme. Viard-Louis played a "Moment Musical" in A flat.

Beethoven's life and career had been fully described in a previous lecture. His Sonatas, said by Hector Berlioz to be his "tone legacy" to posterity, were naturally dwelt upon as the more immediate subject matter. The great master made the orchestra tell the tale of human life in trumpet tongues, but the pianoforte was ever his confidante, the friend of his heart—yet more, his voice, when he could not utter a syllable. His marvellous improvisations on the instrument have been recorded, and an anecdote supplied by Pleyel attested this power. The great variety to be found in the sonatas is surprising; in later life, Beethoven became more metaphysical and mysterious, and to ascend with him to these sublime heights is beyond the capacity of ordinary mortals. The Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, was played as a specimen and thoroughly analysed in the text of the lecture itself.

Mendelssohn's works for the pianoforte always (said the lecturer) display the lightness, agitation, and hurry of the fairy world. The Capriccio, Op. 23, was played. George Onslow (1784—1853), was born in France, of a French mother by an English father. His musical vocation was late to declare itself. Unfortunately for the development of his talents, Onslow led too calm and peaceful a life; he lived in the country, enjoyed a large fortune, and was, so to speak, too happy. Adversity squeezes out the quintessence of choice spirits. Onslow's music shows "an estimable talent," and nothing more. The lecturer played the Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Herr Henkel), No. 7, Op. 16, in A by way of illustrating Onslow's style.

MUSIC AT READING.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Writing musically, little of interest has occurred here during the last month, which seems to have been given up by tacit consent to the private social gatherings of the season.

On Tuesday evening, January 30th, the Annual Concert of the Temperance Choir was given in the Town Hall, and attracted a large audience of the working classes. Miss Agnes Larckom, Miss Susie Fenn, and Mr. Harper Kearton were, as usual, the solo vocalists engaged; and Miss Marie Schumann (violin), and Mr. F. J. Read (organ), contributed the instrumental items of the programme. The Temperance Choir also sang choruses and part songs; but I am sorry that I cannot yet report any improvement in the style of singing. Why do ordinary "Tonic Sol-fa" classes always seem to be so rough? Perhaps the real reason is the raw material of which they are composed.

Miss Marie Schumann, whom I have previously mentioned as one of the most promising students at the Guildhall School of Music, has of late been made much of at popular concerts at Reading, and I would express the hope that her frequent appearances here may not be to her disadvantage. As a young player, she evinces talent which may be successfully developed; but her playing at present needs very much more cultivation in every way, and I question if it be wise to encourage (?) her public performances with too much flattery and applause.

On Friday, February 2nd, morning and evening Recitals were given in the Old Town Hall, by Mdme. Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé. The few real music lovers in the neighbourhood assembled in all their force (though that, unfortunately, but a small one), at the matinée, despite the discouragement of a thoroughly wet day, and no doubt all thoroughly enjoyed the classical programme provided. Mdme. Néruda played the Adagio and Rondo from Spohr's 9th Concerto, Ballade in G minor (Néruda), and "Le Mouvement Perpétuel" (Paganini), as the violin solos, and, with Mr. Hallé, Schumann's Fantasie Stücke (Op. 73) for violin and piano, and Brahms's Grand Sonata in G, Op. 78. Mr. Hallé's solos were the "Moonlight" Sonata, and two of Schubert's impromptus.

Of the playing of Mdme. Néruda I cannot help writing enthusiastically as ever. All the most delicate nuances and difficult executive passages were alike charmingly interpreted with that refined artistic feeling which Mdme. Néruda always evinces.

The programme of the evening recital included works by Bach, Handel, Corelli, Dussek, Viextemps, and Beethoven (the "Appassionata" Sonata, and Sonata in G for piano and violin); but, although it seemed to appeal to the more popular taste, the audience, even in the old and small Town Hall, looked very meagre, and I am afraid we cannot wonder if concert-givers are discouraged from providing good music for the Reading public.

I hear that the Philharmonic Society will perform the "Elijah" early in April, and two or three weeks later the County Society will give the "Martyr of Antioch." The latter performance, I believe, will be in aid of the Royal College of Music, for which a fund has already been subscribed in the county to the amount of £1,500. A local committee has been formed, of which the Mayor is chairman, and he has lately expressed his intention of inviting subscriptions from the townspeople, and obtaining the assistance of the Philharmonic Society in organising a concert in aid of the fund.

EDINBURGH.

Few performances here have caused so much expectation and quiet excitement as that of Gounod's "Redemption," the week before last. It is well known that of anything of which we expect much, disappointment is pretty sure to be the final result, and in music this is very true. The more a piece is lauded before being heard the more is expected from it, and, as a natural result, the performance falls short of our expectations. Of the vast audience collected to hear Gounod's "magnum opus," many no doubt went expecting another "Elijah." It would be interesting to know how many came away under the impression that they had heard such a work. By the way, why cannot, or rather, why is not, the plan adopted of making audiences at first performances record their opinions in some simple way? The trouble would be nil, and the result decidedly interesting. Supposing, for instance, a paper was handed to each one on entering, with one or two simple questions printed, which could be answered in monosyllables, the papers to be given up on leaving the hall. This plan if once adopted would be sure to recommend itself as the only one to correctly determine the degree of favour with which a new work was received. In amateur and band contests the results would be even more valuable and conclusive.

To return to the "Redemption." One thing greatly in its favour here was an exceptionally good performance: a better performance, of anything, our Choral Union has seldom given. Mr. Adam Hamilton, the choral master, who conducted, must be congratulated on the successful result of what must have been great labour and skill in training the choir, which sang, considering the composition, with great taste and considerable precision. The orchestra, led by M. Victor Buziau, played splendidly, and Mr. H. Hartley at the organ did admirable service. The ninth concert of the series included Haydn's Symphony, No. 7 (Saloman Series), concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 4 (Beethoven) and a pretty intermezzo by Leo Delibes. Mr. W. Townsend, a local pianist, acquitted himself very creditably in the concerto and some pieces for piano and orchestra by Raff. Mr. Townsend's only shortcoming is that his playing is too mathematical, if such a term may be used. It is not, in the modern æsthetic phraseology, by any means "intense."

Sir Herbert Oakeley gave one of his delightful organ recitals to the students on the 25th Jany., when several numbers, including ballet music from "Rosamunde" (arranged for organ by Sir Herbert), Andante and Allegro for organ by F. Bache, and part of Handel's Organ Concerto No. 7, were given with great effect by the professor. During the recital a student sang with much acceptance "Lascio ch'io pianga," by Handel and a pleasing ballad by Abt.

WOLVERHAMPTON CLASSICAL CONCERTS.

The second concert of the series took place on the evening of the 25th inst., when the following artists were engaged: violins, Mr. H. Hayward and Mr. F. C. Hayward; violas, Mr. Geo. Roberts and Mr. H. Hayward, junr.; violoncello, Mr. Jos. Owen; pianoforte, Miss Edith Yonge; vocalist, Miss Annie Guest.

The following programme was gone through:—

Quintet in C, for strings	Mozart.
Song, "With verdure clad"	Haydn.
Piano Solo, "Walstein" Sonata	Beethoven.
Violoncello Solo, "Nocturne"	Golterman.
Quartet in C minor, for piano and strings	Mendelssohn.
Song, "Softly sighs"	Weber.
Violin Solo, Concerto	Guhrs.
Song, "Rode's Air and Variations"
Quartet, "God preserve the Emperor"	Haydn.

The Quintet of Mozart and Haydn's Quartet was very ably played; but the gem of the evening was certainly Mendelssohn's beautiful work. The piano part, which has the lion's share of the work was played by Miss Yonge, in a manner that shewed she is gifted with musical powers of a very high order, and doubtless she has a very great future before her. The scherzo and allegro moderato were exceptionally well played by the whole of the artists engaged. Mr. Owen's solo was given in his usual happy style, and greatly pleased the audience. Miss Yonge in the difficult sonata set down for her again shewed her exceptional musical powers. Mr. Hayward met with a very warm reception on his reappearance after a long illness, and his rendering of the concerto set down for him, which is a work that can only be played by artists of the highest order, shewed that he has not lost any of his power, the whole being an exhibition of remarkable tone and finish. Miss Guest in the three difficult songs set down for her, exhibited her sweet voice with much effect, her execution in Rode's Air being particularly good. The accompaniments were very ably played by Miss Haywood and Mr. W. A. Guest. The next and last concert is announced for Feb. 22nd.

Oldham.—The Monday recitals organized by Mr. Houghton still continue to be well patronised, the executant (Mr. J. Greaves) being warmly received. The programmes put forth are classical, and include some good MS. works heard for the first time. At intervals Master D. M. Greaves executed solos on the violin, and songs by Messrs. Lloyd and Hilton, the former rendering a new baritone Egyptian war song in a fine style. On Ash Wednesday a selection from the "Messiah," &c., was given in the Congregational Church, under the direction of Mr. R. Jackson, R.A.M.

The Owens College, Manchester.—At a meeting of the Debating Society, on Friday night, Dr. Hiles lectured upon the importance of music as a part of a liberal education. He spoke of the growing recognition of music as a highly educational discipline, of its admission at Cambridge into the curriculum, and the admission of its graduates into the Convocation of the London University. The following resolution was passed:—"That the study of music has an educational influence of so high and exacting a character as to entitle it to full recognition as an essential part of collegiate training."

Leeds.—At the recent Church Mission in Leeds the singing of hymns formed an important feature, and at some of the services for men only the hymn-singing was particularly fine. At the men's meeting in the Town Hall, which was presided over by the Archbishop of York, the effect of so many male voices in unison was remarkably grand and impressive. On Saturday Dr. Spark gave a recital of sacred music on the Town Hall organ prior to an address by the Rev. W. Aitken in connection with the Church Mission. The singing was led by the Blue Ribbon Army Choir, consisting of nearly 200 male and female voices.

Cork.—On the 29th ult. the choral class of the Cork School of Music gave the annual recital, consisting, this year, of Spohr's "Last Judgment," and a second part miscellaneous. The oratorio was excellently rendered, and reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. T. J. Sullivan, and, indeed, on all parties concerned in its production. The solos were given by Mrs. O'Connell, Mrs. Murphy, Mr. Fitzgibbon, and Mr. Paul. The school, which is now in its fifth session, has shown in this recital that it is doing good work, and is in every way a great success, owing to the tuition being of the best, while the charges are very moderate.

Ealing.—The Ealing Orchestral Society played a selection of pieces at the usual Monday popular entertainment at the Lyric Hall, on the 29th ult. This was the first public appearance of the orchestra, and the performances reflected great credit upon the conductor, Mr. Harold E. Stidolph, and the members. Amongst the pieces were the overture to "The Poet and Peasant" (Suppe); Haydn's Third Symphony; and a Gavotte ("Louis XV.") by Maurice Lee. The vocalists were Miss Annie Larratt and Miss Alice Davies, both of whom were eminently successful in their efforts. These popular entertainments have met with great success, the hall being well filled every week.

Gresham Hall, Brixton.—A performance of Henry Gadsby's dramatic cantata, "The Lord of the Isles," was given on Monday, the 5th inst., by the members of the Brixton Choral and Orchestral Society, under the able direction of Mr. W. Lemare. The soloists were Mdme. Worrell (Edith), Mdme. Raymond (Isabel), Mr. Henry Yates (Ronald and Allaster), Mr. Bell (The Abbot), and Mr. Frederick Bevan (Robert Bruce). The music allotted to the character of Ronald was to have been taken by Mr. H. Taylor, but, in his absence, Mr. Henry Yates (an amateur) very creditably sustained the part, although the endeavour to sing both the parts of Ronald and Allaster proved nearly too much for his vocal powers. A word of praise is due to Mdme. Worrell for her finished singing in the scena, "Tears, bitter tears," and also to Mdme. Raymond and Mr. Bevan in their respective solos, "Hear, Holy Virgin," and "Oh, holy man." The chorus sang with much more fervour and attack than usual. The orchestra also, although at times slightly at variance, was a great improvement upon the last concert.

CHURCH ORATORIOS BY CHURCH MUSICIANS.

ALTHOUGH it is most important to beware of the too rigid adoption of mannerisms and styles in art, there is undoubtedly such a thing as propriety. Of late it has been pointed out by leading musical critics that our excellent living Church composers have in their acceptable contributions to our oratorio school shown a somewhat too pronounced leaning towards the ecclesiastical style. Now, from the eclectic point of sight, it may be fairly asked, Why should a Church composer be denied the right of selecting, within proper limits as regards the just expression of the words, that style for oratorio composition in which his habits of thought will best prompt his musical eloquence? Church art has its own traditions in all its several departments; and the contemplative position of the listener in Church is a distinct attitude, as compared with the more dramatic but less spiritual function of the concert-room auditor. Then the different available means of production at the disposal of the composer of Church music should naturally incline him to the realisation of the passive, reflective effects peculiar to ecclesiastical musical idioms, rather than to the attempt to secure the more vivid and brilliant results of the concert-room. Mendelssohn in his "St. Paul" and "Elijah" may be said to have illustrated the two types of oratorio in good taste and without any narrowness of local feeling, "St. Paul" being written under the influence of the great cantor of Leipzig, and "Elijah" being planned for the adopted country of the great composer of the "Messiah." Indeed, now the oratorio is travelling home again to the shelter of the Church, it should be a matter of congratulation to find our ecclesiastical musicians turning their attention to the compositions of oratorios, in some instances to be primarily heard at our great cathedral festivals. And the development of the Anthem into the Oratorio is by no means an unnatural or unwelcome feature of that great musical movement which is carrying the "musical sermon" back to its real and original home —the Church. It is to be earnestly desired that those of our composers who write with Church-like instincts and yet without too much servility to mere mannerisms, will build up for us a school of English Church oratorios. The works of such men as Armes, J. Barnby, J. F. Bridge, G. Garratt, F. E. Gladstone, Ouseley, Stainer, etc., have already laid the foundations for such a structure. E. H. Turpin.

ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

III.

The intelligent transcription from the original to a new tone medium should be made subject to one leading condition—the suitability of at least a large portion of the original to the expressions and powers of the new executive medium. If this condition be seriously kept in view, there can be little impropriety in the proposed musical translation. Thus it may happen, as a rare case in point, that a given piece originally intended for the violin, may be justifiably re-arranged for the organ. Bach has himself shown to us the practical testimony of approval in this direction. On the other hand, the want of sound judgment in this matter is only too often displayed, and movements which rely entirely upon the special tone colour or mechanical peculiarities of their original mediums, are ruthlessly dragged again into publicity in some new shape or other by which the original flavour of the music is completely sacrificed or destroyed. It may be a fact that the prevailing universality of the pianoforte actually compels the transcription, sooner or later, of every piece, vocal or instrumental, which has attained popularity in some other primary condition; but such a necessity is surely to be deplored. However, it is time to attempt to deal practically with this matter of musical transference. The question may be viewed pictorially with some gain, perhaps. Save in full and generalised effects, orchestral passages usually present prominent or foreground figures, with more or less subordinate background filling in or harmonic support; and there is to complete the animation of the picture, an inevitable amount of activity, sometimes to be found in the prominent foreground figures, but quite as often to be noted as present in the more subordinate filling in or background of the scene. Now, in approaching the task of re-arrangement or transcription, the arranger must take care to present all the leading or front melodic figures if possible, even if at times the exigencies of the key-board instrument compel the alteration or reduction of some of the idioms into some one compass or other which will bring the conjointly moving chief figures within the player's manual grip. Or at other times it may be found necessary to give up some such melodic figures as stand out clearly in the orchestra, but which on the key-board cannot be well brought within the mechanism of the instrument, or expressed without too much interference with the prominence of the absolutely chief present figure of melody. Then the transcriber must secure the presence of enough of the background and filling in harmonies as will support the leading objects on the musical canvas, so to speak. And, lastly, he must take care to represent the subordinate activity, which, running in an undercurrent, is neverthless an essential feature of the musical scheme, as forming a musical atmosphere, in which the chief figures live, and which lends to the general effect the particular sense of pace and time proportion, without which the piece has but little definite meaning or purpose.

NEW ENGLISH OPERA MUSIC.

A new comic opera entitled "Cymbia, or the Magic Thimble," will shortly be produced at the Strand Theatre. The libretto of the work has been written by Mr. H. Paulton, and the music is composed by Florian Pascal. So far as one can judge from an examination of the words and music, the opera contains the necessary elements of success. It is bright, tuneful, and, while presenting many examples of the strong rhythmic features which seem generally to underlie what is accepted as "popular music," it is at the same time devoid of that taint of vulgarity that is so offensive to the cultured musical ear. The scoring is clear and the orchestral colouring ingeniously contrived; the interest of the work is maintained up to its close, the third act—usually the weakest in comic opera—being probably the best.

There are not wanting signs for those who can read them, that English musical art in all its phases is gradually throwing off the foreign leading strings which have done so much to hamper and indeed well nigh obliterate, native talent. Besides orchestral works by some of our modern English composers that are finding acceptance abroad, Mr. Villiers Stanford's opera, "The Veiled Prophet," has recently been produced at Hanover, where it seems to have met with distinct success. Native composers are evidently beginning to assert their individuality, and all who are interested in the now perceptible renaissance of English musical art must rejoice at the indications of the growing, vigorous life which it is exhibiting. Opera, both in its serious and comic forms, has for many years past been freely, indeed, almost entirely, supplied by foreign writers. If only our English composers, with eyes observant of the advance of art, will show that they can supply works alike free from French inanities and German dulness, but possessing tune, together with the higher attributes of musicianly treatment and dramatic fitness, they will certainly find audiences ready both to appreciate and support their efforts.

As there are already two operas, one by Mr. Mackenzie and the other by Mr. Thomas, announced for immediate production, "Cymbia," will make the third new work from English pens to be given in London during the forthcoming season. The freshness and originality of Florian Pascal's songs and pianoforte works have already attracted considerable attention; one can but wish that his essay in the new field of operatic music may display equal ability, and meet with public approval.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Jan. 31, 1883.

This would not be an ill-chosen moment for casting a backward glance at the doings of the musical season, now more than half way on the road to its close. For M. Pasdeloup has come to the end of two of his three series of concerts already. Easter will soon be upon us, and then—farewell to classical music again for another six months or so.

All things considered, the season has not been a very remarkable one. The directors of all the concert enterprises have relied almost wholly upon the attraction of old established favourites like the Beethoven symphonies, the "Damnation of Faust," and the like. MM. Hillemacher's "Loreley," M. Duvernoy's "Sardanapale," and M. Godard's "Dramatic Overture" have indeed been almost the only important novelties we have heard. The preludes to "Parsifal" and "Tristan and Isolde" have been the chief Wagnerian features in the programmes. Félicien David's "Désert" has been given with great success at the Châtelet, and Liszt's "Faust" music with less success at the Cirque; while M. Lamoureux has given us an opportunity, too rare, unhappily, of hearing a few fragments of that "Armide" which, in the days when he was only a candidate for the managership of the opera, M. Vaucorbeil was always promising to revive for our delectation. And this is almost all in the concert programmes which needs recalling except the magnificent execution of the Choral Symphony, under M. Lamoureux's direction, and the appearance of Mdme. Essipoff, who played Chopin's Concerto in E minor at the Theâtre du Chateau d'Eau last Sunday, and was received with heartier demonstrations of enthusiasm than, perhaps, Rubinstein himself has ever been greeted with here. And well the gifted artist deserved the applause she got. She has the four great qualities all pianists should have to be perfect. Oddly enough they all begin with a p—power, poetry, piquancy, and precision.

I append the full programme given at the Chateau d'Eau on the occasion :—

"Michael Angelo" (Concert Overture)	Niels Gade.
"Choral Symphony" (200 executants)	Beethoven.
Soli by Mdlles. Anne Soubre and Rocher, MM. Bosquin and Auguez.
Concerto in E minor, for piano	Chopin.
Mdme. Essipoff.
Prelude to "Tristan and Iseult"	Wagner.
Overture to "Athalie"	Mendelssohn.

Conductor - - - M. LAMOUREUX.

M. Pasdeloup's programme—a remarkably full one—comprised the "Pastoral" Symphony, an air from M. Saint-Säens' Cantata "La Lyre et la Harpe" (which, by-the-bye, was performed not long ago at the Conservatoire), and a Larghetto of Mozart's, and the whole of the opening act of "Lohengrin," with soli by MM. Bolly (Lohengrin), Lauwers (Frederick), Claverie (the king), Mdme. Caron (Elsa), and Mdlle. Barre (Ortrud).

I have said nothing so far, I believe, of the opening of the new Eden Theatre, which has been one of the theatrical events of the month in Paris. Music plays a great part in the programmes of the management, and a band which would do no discredit to the Opéra or to any of the concert halls has been gathered together under the able direction of the two conductors, Signor Pantaleoni, who conducts the execution of the ballet music to "Excelsior," and M. Félix Pardon, the conductor of the occasional and bal masqué music. Signor Pantaleoni is better known in Italy than in Paris. He conducts somewhat à la Verdi, but with less spirit. M. Félix Pardon was for some time director of the band at the Brussels Eden, and is well known as the composer of several operettas, and other works.

MM. Pantaleoni and Pardon have, roughly, seventy instruments in their orchestra, amongst them fifteen first violins, ten second violins, eight altos, six or eight 'celle, eight contrabasses, four cornets-à-piston, two bassoons, two clarinets, two oboes, two flutes, a nouvelle basse, saxhorn contrebasse, etc.

A capital band of Tziganes also plays at irregular intervals in the promenade upstairs, and altogether the musical arrangements of the Eden are as satisfactory as the most critical could desire them to be.

C. Harry Meltzer.

"La Befana" is the name of a new fantastic operetta by Signor Canti, of Rome.

At Namur a new Quartet Society has been founded. Concerts will be given in March and April.

News from Madrid tells of the great success of Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," with the new Ophelia, Bianca Donadio.

The Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung notes with admiration the custom common both in England and America of using analytical programmes at classical concerts.

M. Michaelis, the Parisian music publisher, is still adding to the "Chefs d'Œuvre de l'Opera Francais," the last contribution being "Ernelinde, Princesse de Norvège," words by Poinsinet, music by Philidor.

After spending some days at Venice with his son-in-law, Richard Wagner, the Abbé Liszt has arrived in Pesth, where he will remain until the spring. According to custom, he will make Weimar his summer residence.

The Theatre Royal de la Monnaie, Brussels, has lately been concerned with the production of the "Nibelungen," which met with more than ordinary success. A Wagner concert was afterwards given in Brussels by the members of Herr Angelo Neumann's company.

The indefatigable composer Suppé has written a new operetta, "Le Voyage en Afrique," to a libretto by MM. West and Genée. The first performance will take place towards the end of this month or the beginning of next at the "Ander Wien" Theatre, Vienna.

Herr Albert Cohn, of Berlin, announces the publication of a "Biography of the Musical Composers up to the year 1700, which are preserved in the Town Library, the Library of the Academic Institute for Church Music, the Royal and University Libraries of Breslau. A contribution to the History of Music in the XV., XVI., and XVII. centuries, by Emil Bohn. Price 14 marks."

Tottenham.—On Wednesday, January 31, a successful concert was given by the Tottenham Wesleyan Musical Society, the conductor of which is Mr. R. J. Pitt, who is to be congratulated on raising the choir to such proficiency. Only two seasons back this society was performing but simple part-songs and glees, but, owing to the untiring efforts of Mr. R. J. Pitt, the society was able to bring forward at this concert Spohr's "Last Judgment," and in such a way that we may say with safety that no local choral society could possibly have performed it better. The choruses were rendered very carefully. All members of the choir appeared to take an individual interest in the work before them, and this is the surest and only way of working successfully. The principal soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. George F. Grover, Mr. Hanson, and Alfred Moore. There was also a most efficient band of Academy students and others. Mr. John Jefferys presided at the organ, and Mr. George F. Grover at the piano. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, the chief feature in which was a violin solo, Andante and Allegro (concerto), by Mendelssohn, performed by Mr. Arthur Payne, R.A.M.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. W. T. Best's recital of Saturday drew a large and admiring audience. The first piece was a Festival Prelude by G. A. Thomas on "Ein Feste Burg." This, in the hands of Mr. Best, proved to be very fine and effective. A Christmas Pastorale, by Moriconi, proved to be ear-tickling enough to win an encore. The composer is now organist at St. Peter's, Rome. The piece is neither particularly interesting, original, or valuable ; and had it been written by a native of any portion of the United Kingdom, would not have secured the smallest consideration from the Liverpool organist. Handel's cheery, fine Water Music met with great applause. Rossini's "William Tell" overture was finely played, and only escaped an encore probably owing to the lateness of the hour. Liszt's Marche Hongroise, "Racokzy," made a capital finale to an interesting recital. Miss Marian Burton was the vocalist, and was encored in Sullivan's "The Lost Chord." Mr. W. G. Wood accompanied. Mr. Best will again be the solo organist this evening.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

On Tuesday last Mr. E. Prout, B.A., gave a lecture of very remarkable interest on the "Combination of the Orchestra and Organ, especially in Church Music," at the Holborn Town Hall. The subject is one of large and growing importance ; for in these days of large musical effects and combinations, the two musical giants are being brought more and more into mutual relationship, and the Church is once more welcoming back to her aid the orchestra, after much misapprehension and foolish neglect, almost amounting at one period to banishment. An exceptionally large audience of members and friends of the College of Organists awaited with serious attention Mr. Prout's thoughtful words and weighty opinions. The lecture opened with an extensive and singularly perspicuous historical survey of the scores of the great masters in which the organ is employed, from Bach to Mendelssohn. The use of the organ by Haydn and Mozart was a very interesting branch of Mr. Prout's paper. This valuable historical survey was followed by some very artistic and judicious hints as to the use of the organ by the organist as well as by the composer. Dr. J. F. Bridge occupied, in an able manner, the position of chairman. Mr. James Higgs and Dr. Gladstone also addressed the meeting.

The next lectures of the College of Organists will be a course of four by Prof. G. A. Macfarren, on Bach's "24 Preludes and Fugues," a work of later date than the immortal "48." Mr. Windyer Clarke will play the pianoforte illustrations. The course will be delivered on four successive Tuesdays, beginning with February 20th, at the Holborn Town Hall.

EASTBOURNE.

At the St. Saviour's recent Parochial Festival the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc., gave a short lecture on "The main principles of musical services in the Church of England."

The lecturer said he had thought it would be well to divide the subject into two parts—first of all to say a few words on the rise and progress historically of English Church music from the time of the Reformation ; and secondly to offer a few remarks on what were the special characteristics of the true choral services. He thought on both points there might be some who would not be sorry to have a few facts laid before them with which they were probably unacquainted at present. At the time of the Reformation—the schools of France and Germany, having for centuries been the central and rallying point of music—great changes were caused by more than one circumstance. In the first place there was the translation from Latin into English, and there followed an important change in the general style of church music. One of the great features of the Reformation was that the great rage for metrical Psalm singing sprang up, causing more elaborate choral services to be kept up in the cathedrals. Then originated the English National School of Church Music, which he had always said there was every reason to be proud of. He thought so as an Englishman, and having heard the best music of the Roman Catholics abroad—in Rome, Germany and France—he said deliberatively that on the whole the English School of Church Music was by far the best for the services of the sanctuary. He was not alone in that opinion. He remembered being in Rome in 1851, and meeting a Roman priest doing duty under a cardinal, who had one of the largest libraries of music in the city, and the priest told him that he had no hesitation in saying that in some respects the English Church music was superior to that in the Vatican Library. And to whom did they owe this ! The first composer of choral services was Marbeck, and when they met with persons not well informed upon this matter, who told them his works were a relic of Popery or something of that sort, they should be prepared to refute the assertion, because it was a stern fact that Marbeck very nearly suffered death for his strong Reformation principles. He then went on to notice Tallis, Bird, Bence, Batten, Morley, Gibbons and other composers of choral services of the fifteenth century, remarking that Gibbons's music was the most pure counterpoint ever produced and would compare favourably with the Italian writers, and they were indebted to him as the great standard. The madrigals died out with Gibbons, but exercised a great influence on church music. Troublous times then came on, and during the time of Oliver Cromwell nothing but metrical Psalms were used, and the old English school was not revived until Charles II. came to the throne, when the organs were restored and the choirs re-endowed. The first distinguished composers of the choral church music of that day were Hopkins, Turner, Blow, Rogers and Crichton, who was more of the old school. There was at that time a great demand for new music, and the two greatest writers were Blow and Purcell, the last-named being the greatest genius of his time, from 1658 to 1695, and composed a prodigious quantity of music. Then there were Weldon, Clark and Croft, but none of these came on the same level as Purcell, who would have produced a school of his own, except for the advent of Handel, who was taken up and almost worshipped by all lovers of music, and who checked the indigenous choral style. He did not know whether the influence of Handel on English church music was on the whole good. Then followed Sir John Travers, Lord Chandos and Lord Mornington, who had the choral services kept up, but it was still experimental and was only kept up in the colleges and cathedrals. Battishill Dr. Crotch, Charles and Samuel Wesley, Sir John Goss and the junior Dr. Wesley were then instanced as composers of church, music, and there were a great many other talented men who contributed to the repértoire of church music. They had reason to think in the present day that a great time was coming for English church music. Passing to the second part of his subject, the Doctor remarked that one great characteristic in church music should be variety. The different parts of the services required different treatment. If the whole of the service was treated in the same way it became tedious, and people were unable to keep up their attention. In many small parish churches they must be satisfied without much variety, but at St. Saviour's they could do anything, and he congratulated them upon having such an organ and choir. The first part of the service he would notice was the reading, which was the music of eloquence. There was the monotone in which the prayers were read. Then the inflections of plain song and the Psalm chants, which should be without hurry, and in regular and strict time, and with the accents and pointing so as not to destroy the grammar. He thought they had all that at St. Saviour's. He then noticed the Canticles, which were not quite an anthem—the words should not be repeated too frequently. Last of all they came to the great development of anthems, which they had come to look upon as a sort of choir voluntary—which the congregation did not take part in, but listened to. The object of anthems was to dispose the mind to devotion and to relieve from fatigue, and had become an important factor in church services. Then there were the metrical Psalms and hymn tunes, which were not a part of cathedral music, which he might term hymnody, if he might use such a word. He should like to hear more of the congregations join in it as much as they could. He had not made up his mind whether it was best to have all the hymns sung in harmony, or whether it would not be better to have some of them in unison. The great point which the congregations ought to bear in mind was that the hymns were what they ought to sing lustily and with a good courage. The advantages of variety were many. If they had all the services in a monotone, could they stand it? Or if they had all anthems could they keep up their attention? That would be simply a concert in church. He concluded by remarking that he had been rather longer than he anticipated, but it was a difficult matter to condense so many different matters into one short speech.

Dr. Sangster (organist at St. Saviour's) next gave a brief address relative to the new organ. In the course of his remarks he said:—In addressing you about the organ at St. Saviour's I feel that we have arrived at that point when the organ may be said to speak for itself, which it does in tones of a most religious and noble quality. I reasoned thus in preparing the specification: St. Saviour's is an important church in an important town on the South coast—a church remarkable for its architectural beauties and for the crowds of worshippers that assemble there—therefore the organ should be no ordinary instrument, but one of the best we could get, and in this I consider we have succeeded. It has tones diverse, refined and grand, and some of the highest authorities pronounce it to be one of the finest organs ever turned out by the eminent firm of Walker and Sons. There is an idea abroad that it is too large for the church. I have heard this said of many good church organs. You cannot get all these varieties of tone without building a large instrument. After the admirable recital given this afternoon upon the organ by Sir Frederick Ouseley, I am more than ever convinced that we have done a good thing in adding such a splendid piece of art-work to St. Saviour's.

PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS AND MUSICAL DIRECTORIES.

At a meeting of the Society of Professional Musicians, held in the Old Town Hall, Manchester, on Saturday evening, Dr. R. W. Crowe, of Liverpool, presiding, a paper was read by Mr. James J. Monk, of Liverpool, on "The Compilation of Musical Directories."

Mr. Monk complained of the erratic manner in which musical directories are compiled, remarking that the absence of a trustworthy directory of the profession seemed to be explained by the fact that there was no system of registration for teachers of music. At present it was quite competent for amateurs or "semi-professionals" to have their names inserted in a directory called "musical," thereby putting themselves on a par as musicians with men who had made music their life-study and the sole means of their existence. By this means "semi-professionals," as they styled themselves, were enabled to get trade and professional quotations, to the injury of the teacher of the art and the dealer in music and musical instruments; and also, by the same false representative publicity, to secure engagements as professional singers or players, thereby earning fees which rightly belonged to professional musicians. One great reason why the musical directories were so untrustworthy was the present lack of any central source of authoritative information; but surely this might be overcome by appointing in each town a musician of good standing, whose trustworthiness and impartiality could be thoroughly relied upon for local compilation. This system appeared to be feasible until such a time as a local registry should be formulated under the proposed Registration Act.—In the discussion which ensued on the paper, Dr. Hiles said that as a society they ought to decline to subscribe to any directory published on the present system.—Mr. Edward Hilton and the chairman said that the real cure for the evil complained of could only come with a system of legal registration.—Mr. Monk said that that society might do something in the way of bringing out a trustworthy directory.—Mr. W. D. Hall (Liverpool) said there could be no doubt of the need of a trustworthy directory. It was a work which, in his opinion, could only be satisfactorily done through a society like that, with the co-operation of professional musicians throughout the country.—The secretary said that in the present state of affairs it would be better to try to purge the existing directories than to initiate a new work. In the absence of a system of registration, they would find themselves in a difficulty as to knowing who were really professional men and who were not. If a Registration Bill was passed, the society could start a directory if no one else would do it.—Mr. Monk said that it would not be of the slightest avail to try to influence the present publishers.—The Chairman said he could not see that there would be any great difficulty in getting the names of men who actually made their livelihood by teaching music. That would be enough for the purposes of a directory.—Dr. Marsden and Mr. John Wrigley also took part in the discussion. It was ultimately unanimously resolved, on the motion of Mr. Hall, seconded by Mr. W. J. Young, "That the members of this society, being aware of the defects of existing musical directories, desire the council to take into consideration the feasibility of compiling a musical directory to be issued under this society's auspices, soliciting for that purpose, in the first instance, the co-operation of well-known musicians throughout the country."

The Liverpool Evening Express has a leader on Mr. Monk's paper, endorsing his views on the subject matter of his lecture:—

'From the paper on "Musical Directories" which Mr. James J. Monk read at Manchester on Saturday before the associated musicians, it is evident that he is very much in earnest in his protest against amateurs being described as "professors of music." No doubt those who devote themselves to music and depend upon it for a livelihood have some ground for feeling aggrieved at the position assumed by persons who only use music to fill up their leisure, or to eke out incomes derived from other sources. But it is easier to acknowledge the evil of the present system than to discover a remedy. Mr. Monk suggests that the musical directories should be made directories of bonâ fide professionals whose income is derived solely from the practice of the art, and to secure the exclusion of the non-professional or semi-professional musicians he would submit all names to local censors. It is obvious if this were done the names excluded would exceed those entered, and would tend largely to diminish the sale and circulation of the books, which are points of consideration to the publishers, even if the professional musicians think them beneath notice. Mr. Monk's only hope will lie in the power of the new association to bring out a directory of their own. Do they feel strong enough for this enterprise?

The Liverpool Courier remarks, in the course of a leading article:—

The fact that a person is "only an amateur" does not prove incompetence for the position assumed. Even if a standard registry is obtained it will be difficult to exclude many amateurs, though the list might with advantage be freed from names which are obviously out of place there.

Anecdote of Rossini.—The first time the Barbiere di Seviglia was produced (at the Theatre Argentino in Rome) a singular combination of comic circumstances, which in Naples would be considered as the result of the evil eye, "jettatura," aided in causing a fiasco. The theatre was unusually full of priests, and a great prejudice existed against the bold young composer who had dared to set to new music the opera of "Paisiello." To add to this prejudice, Rossini unfortunately wore a greenish-coloured coat, which excited a storm of laughter as soon as he appeared in the orchestra. No sooner did Almaviva (played by Garcia) commence the serenade beneath Rosina's window than all the cords of his guitar snapped with a loud twang, calling forth another burst of ominous laughter. The same thing happened to Figaro's mandolin as soon as the jolly barber attempted to touch a string. Then appeared Don Basilio, who, under the influence of the fatal "jettatura," stumbled and fell, knocking his nose against the side scene, so that on rising his white bands were stained with blood. In his pain and confusion he wiped his nose on the hem of his soutane, and now whistles, calls, and shouts of laughter drowned the voices of the singers and the din of the orchestra, and poor Rossini, covered with shame, fled to hide in his own house. It is well known that the second representation of the opera was a triumph. Rossini was in bed, and was aroused by loud acclamations below his window. He was forced to rise, dress in haste, and descend into the street, and was accompanied to a festive supper by crowds of enthusiastic people carrying torches.

Passing Events.

Mr. Geaussent's Choir gave a concert at St. James's Hall on February 6th. The programme included Mendelssohn's psalm, "Sing to the Lord."

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and Bach's Double Concerto in C, for two pianos, formed portions of one of Mr. C. Hallé's recent Manchester concerts.

A new opera, entitled "Mam'zelle Nitouche," by Hervé, was produced at the Théâtre des Variétés, Paris, on the 26th of January. The work is described as being completely successful.

The Brightonian of February 3rd contains a cartoon portrait of Mr. J. Sawyer, Mus.Bac., F.C.O., as a well recognised local member of the profession, writer on theoretical and antiquarian musical topics, and organist at one of the leading Brighton churches.

Handel's "Samson" was well performed on January 31st at Canterbury by the local Philharmonic Society, under the excellent direction of Dr. Longhurst. The chief singers were the Misses Ellen Horne and Winthrop, Messrs. A. Kenningham and R. Rhodes.

Two lectures, given under the auspices of the Philological Society on the 2nd and 16th, are of interest to the musician. The first was on the "History of English Sounds," by Mr. Henry Sweet, M.A., and the second, by the same gentleman, "On the Intonation of spoken English."

The Toronto Philharmonic Society will, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington, perform Gounod's "Redemption" this season. The same work was recently given in Boston, U.S., but, in consequence of legal difficulties, with the accompaniments on pianofortes and American organ.

The Crystal Palace Company have decided to manage the details of the approaching Handel Festival themselves. Many of the leading artists will be the same as before, no doubt, including M. Sainton as leading first violin, and Sir M. Costa as conductor. The band will consist of 425 players, and the chorus will be composed of both town and country singers.

The public trial of a new chemical fire-engine on the Thames Embankment on February 7th was a matter of interest to owners and managers of concert-rooms, musical instrument manufactories, etc. A feature of the invention is the use of chemicalised water charged with carbonic acid gas, a sure antidote to fire. The utility and economy of the invention are undeniable.

The Academical Board of Trinity College, London, has awarded the gold medal annually offered for an essay on a musical subject to Miss Melloney Stephens, of St. Leonard's-on-Sea, for her essay on "The Value to the Musician of a Knowledge of Modern Languages"; and the prize of two guineas to Miss H. L. Elmes, of Addlestone, for her essay on "Early Writers for the Pianoforte."

It will be noticed that Dr. C. J. Frost will give a recital on the very fine and interesting organ at Christ Church, Newgate Street, on February 12th. This is the first recital in the church most probably which has been given since Mendelssohn played there. It is to be hoped that Dr. C. J. Frost will meet with such encouragement as will lead to his continuing to give similar performances. The possession by Christ Church of such an organ, and the presence of so accomplished an organist, fully justify this hope.

On February 1st a most interesting lecture was given at the London Institution on "The Anthem," by the Rev. W. Sparrow Simpson, D.D., F.S.A., sub-dean, succentor, and librarian of St. Paul's Cathedral. The illustrations were sung by Messrs. S. Barry, T. W. Hanson, H. J. Dutton, E. Dalzell, E. Wharton, Charles Tinney, and some of the chorister boys of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus.Bac., sub-organist of St. Paul's, played the accompaniments on the pianoforte. The anthems sung included specimens by John Redford (organist of St. Paul's Cathedral between 1530 and 1540), Farrant, A. Gibbons, H. Purcell, Haydn, Thomas Attwood (organist of St. Paul's Cathedral), Mendelssohn, S. S. Wesley, C. Gounod, J. Barnby, and J. Stainer.

The St. George's Glee Union held their 169th monthly concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 2nd inst. The programme was a miscellaneous one, vocal solos being contributed by Miss N. Watts and Miss Matbilde Prague, Mr. H. Schartan, and Mr. R. F. Roberts. Herr von Joel and Mr. George J. Sumpter played selections for the pianoforte. Owing to the bad weather there were only about fifty members in the choir, but the part-songs were unusually well sung. They included "The dawn of day" (Reay), "Come, live with me" (S. Bennett), "My bonnie lass, she smileth" (Morley), etc. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

A Correspondent writes:—"The advantage of committing the musical department of a leading London paper to a foreigner is amusingly exemplified by a statement made in a brief obituary of the late Flotow, in which the writer inferred that the opera composer had himself written the air known as the "Last Rose of Summer," and that its popularity in England dated only from the success of the opera "Martha," in which it appeared. The same writer, in treating of the piracy of Americans who steal our musical works, and then serve them afresh for their orchestra, remarks:—"Even experienced artists can never fully realize the living power of a great musical creation from the dead symbols inserted in the staff of five lines." This must surely raise a smile even from the tyro of score reading. As well might one say that we can only fully understand books by hearing them read, and denounce the dead letters which form but the symbols of silent words.

TRIADS: THEIR RELATIONSHIP AND TREATMENT.

By Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus.Doc.

The following extracts from Helmholtz may here be quoted with advantage. He says (p. 326, of Mr. Ellis's translation): "The minor triad is very decidedly less harmonious than the major triad, in consequence of the combinational tones." And again (p. 328) speaking of the combinational tones, he says, "the foreign element thus introduced into the minor chord is not sufficiently distinct to destroy the harmony, but it is enough to give a mysterious, obscure effect to the musical character and meaning of these chords, an effect for which the hearer is unable to account, because the weak combinational tones on which it depends are concealed by other louder tones, and are audible only to a practised ear" (i.e., separately audible.)

But, in connection with this fact, another one of equal, if not greater, importance must be mentioned, viz., that whereas the inversions of a major triad retain their character as part of a major chord, the 1st inversion of a minor triad does not possess quite the same serious or gloomy character as that which marked the chord in its original position.

This is because, in the first place, the interval of a minor 3rd is less consonant than its inversion, a major 6th (and the only intervals present in the inverted chord are the major 3rd, the major 6th, and the perfect fourth); and in the second place the combinational tones resulting from this inverted chord are the double octave below the lowest note, the 12th below the middle note, and the 5th below the lowest:—.

Ex. 40.

It thus happens that, whereas in the original position of the minor triad, the note C, as the lowest combinational tone, makes its influence felt, in the 1st inversion the lowest resultant sound is G, and there is therefore a strengthening of the existing bass, rather than the suggestion of another.

No doubt, it is to this indeterminate character of an inverted minor triad that the good effect of a succession of first inversions, up or down the scale, may be traced.

Ex. 41.

If the minor triad on E is succeeded by the major triad on F, both being in their original position, the transition is very abrupt, because the former triad suggests a scale with F ♯ in it, while the root of the latter is F ♮. Whereas the 1st inversion of the 1st chord is not sufficiently indicative of any scale to make its progession to the 1st inversion of the 2nd chord in any degree harsh.

Ex. 42. A.

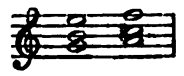
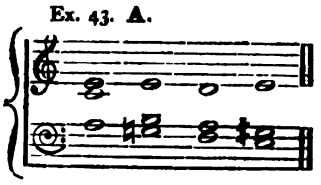
Ex. 42. B.



All the notes of the major scale may be taken as the bass of a triad in its first inversion. Even the imperfect triads on the 2nd and 7th degrees lose to some extent their dissonant character when they are inverted.

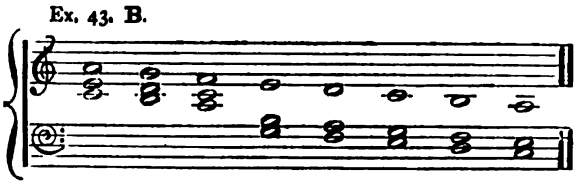
In dealing with the minor key, however, more care is needful. The 5th of the scale cannot, strictly speaking, be taken as the bass of a 1st inversion, because the interval from the leading note to the 3rd of the scale is a diminished 4th, and therefore is a harsh dissonance. It has, however, been the constant practice of the great composers to write an inverted triad upon the lowered 7th of the scale when the bass descends by the step of a second:—

Ex. 43. A.



and examples are not wanting of the exceptional use also of a chord of the 6th on the 2nd of the scale with a lowered 7th in the highest part, and of a 1st inversion having the 5th of the scale for its bass, again with the 7th lowered. But the examples which I have found invariably occur in a chain of descending 6ths, thus:

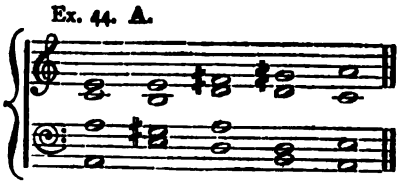
Ex. 43. B.



Any student who is desirous to verify this statement will find illustrations in Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 10, No. 1, and Op. 27, No. 2 (in the first movement of one, and the last of the other), also in the slow movement of Mendelssohn's first organ Sonata, and, if these are not sufficient, in Bach's great Toccata in F.

I had intended to make my remarks more complete by adding a few words in regard to the 2nd inversion of triads, but this paper has already reached so immoderate a length that I refrain. Before concluding, however, I trust you will pardon me if I direct your attention to two chords which were formerly used more frequently than they are at the present time. I allude to a major chord on the 4th and a minor chord on the 2nd degree of the minor scale. These chords both contain the chromatically raised 6th degree of the scale, and they are only used with good effect when the part which contains this note is proceeding by conjunct degrees from the 5th to the leading note of the scale:—

Ex. 44. A.



Ex. 44. B.

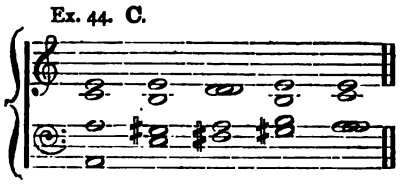
Ex. 44. C.



These must be regarded as exceptional progressions, arising from the desire of contrapuntists to avoid, in purely vocal passages, the step of an augmented 2nd, but I venture to think that such chords, when properly introduced, have a really beautiful effect, quaint though it may be; and I would argue from this that, although in making ordinary combinations of chords the suggestions of Nature will be our safest guide, Art will sometimes discover other methods. It is possible to copy nature so closely that some element of beauty is hidden. For example, the painter who wishes to pourtray a butterfly in actual flight must give to the wings that filmy appearance which is produced by their rapid movement, but in doing so the exquisite markings on those wings are lost to the eye, and it is therefore a question for consideration whether the representation of a butterfly poised in the air, apparently motionless, might not be truer art, although it would be a less faithful copy of Nature. The illustration is perhaps rather far-fetched, but it may serve to elucidate my meaning.

My main endeavour in following out this enquiry has, however, been to ascertain what musical progressions are the most natural. The subject has expanded to an extent that I never dreamed of when I first took it in hand, and now that I relinquish it I feel that it has been very inadequately treated. Nevertheless, if my observations should suggest to any student of harmony only one idea which may prove useful to him in the pursuit of our art, I shall feel that neither his time nor mine has been wasted.

Symphony No 5, in C minor ..... Beethoven.
Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

The Crystal Palace concerts were resumed on Saturday last, the audience being a fairly good one, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather. The chief attraction was Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor, which is so great a favourite that when the last plèbiscite was taken for the performance of a particular symphony, the C minor was second on the list, the Pastoral coming first by only a few votes. There was no appreciable falling off in the far-famed Crystal Palace orchestra, which is rather surprising, seeing that for the last seven weeks it has been doing duty at the pantomime, playing music-hall songs, and imparting animation to the acrobatic feats of clown and pantaloon. No wonder that we too often hear of the resignation of some of the best performers, whilst they are compelled to undergo this annual infliction. Mr. Manns was warmly received on his re-appearance after an absence of eight weeks in Scotland, and the concert commenced with Berlioz's charming overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

The only novelty in the programme was No. 5 Concerto, by Litolff, not No. 3, which was described in the book of words. As the name of Litolff is known chiefly as one of the great German publishers, it may be well to state that Mr. Henry Litolff is on his mother's side an Englishman, and was born in London in 1818. He was for three years a pupil of Moscheles, who, encountering the boy when only ten years old, at Collard's pianoforte warehouse, and finding him to be in extreme poverty, with his usual kindness gave him lessons for nothing. He afterwards settled in Germany, and brought out many compositions, especially pianoforte concertos. If we are to judge of his works by the one performed on Saturday last it will be better that we should look upon him as an eminent publisher than a composer, for a more uninteresting thing than this concerto has not been heard for a long time at the Crystal Palace. During the performance a general drowsiness came over the audience; but as one has heard before now of exemplary people going to sleep in church, a few winks during an unattractive piece of music may be very excusable.

M. Louis Breitner, who made his first appearance at these concerts, was, no doubt, unfortunate in his choice of this concerto, but, with due allowance for this, his touch was at times hard and unsympathetic. He was, however, more successful in the shorter pieces by Rubinstein, Chopin, and Beethoven.

Mdme. Patey needs no need of praise, as she is generally happy in her choice and successful in her interpretation. R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

I am not afraid that Dr. Sloman will dissent from my own humble opinion about the "Concerto Symphonique" of Litolff in C minor, No. 5, vexatiously substituted at the very last moment for the announced one in E flat. Why remove from the dusty shelf this dreary specimen of non-inspiration? The very title sounds conceited, but is justified to a certain extent; for the orchestral score quite overbears the pianoforte, here too often reduced to the lowly condition of an obbligato instrument, only allowed to speak at intervals, as it were, on sufferance. Mr. Litolff has extended his heavy work to four movements. I could find but little to admire except in the slow one, a rather sweet cantabile, but too rudely broken by an agitato after the manner, but not the style, of Schubert in his 10th Sonata (A major) and the unfinished symphony, No. 8. Both the allegros sound wild, uncouth, unsymmetrical, and boisterous; the scherzo, a sort of "tarantella," with pointed accentuation, may be thought quaint, but is hardly original. The composer reminds one of the aphorism about good intentions not carried out. Mr. Breitner's unsympathetic touch and rather monotonous style could do nothing to promote the success of the work, received with chilling indifference by a rather thin audience. The pianoforte solos seemed to please the public. The gavotte of Mozart made no impression; why not have chosen, instead, the pretty little March in F from the same opera? The symphony, unhappily placed last on the list of numbers, might surely be allowed an interval of repose. This and the "Eroica" (not to speak of the "Pastoral") are worked to death by our grand orchestras, whilst other works, by various masters, equally fine, are only reproduced after long intervals. I heard Berlioz's fiery overture in Paris, fifteen months ago, at one of Colonne's Sunday afternoon concerts at the Châtelet Theatre, Paris, where it evoked more applause than at the Crystal Palace. A. M.

The above remarks on Litolff's concerto are partly corroborated by the learned critic of the Times, who writes:—

"This concerto is an example of how much can be done in art by one who, although not gifted with supreme genius, cultivates with care and zeal such talents as nature has granted him. . . . . The title "Symphonic Concerto," invented by Litolff, is not altogether inappropriate. For the pianoforte appears in the light of an orchestral component rather than of a solo instrument, and the number of movements is four. It is earnest in character and broadly designed, and although the actual power of the composer is not always equal to the high purpose he evidently aims at, his intention at least should be acknowledged. . . . . The chief materials of the first movement have been announced and even partially developed before the solo instrument is heard. . . . . . The slow movement is, as far as may be judged by a first hearing, the most successful portion of the work. A tender first theme is interrupted by a loud flourish of the brass. . . . . The 3rd movement, although more conventional than its predecessor, is not without the delicate humour beseeming a scherzo. It is bright and joyful, the triangle marking the lively rhythm. The last movement, although the most effective from the virtuoso's point, is, perhaps partly for that reason the least interesting as an artistic conception; its structure is somewhat incoherent. Mr. Breitner's touch seemed somewhat loud and wanting in flexibility. . . . ." etc. [The italics are our own].

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

The performance of this scheme requires but brief notice, as the works are all familiar to the subscribers. Mr. Henry Holmes, a pupil of Spohr, is recognised as a very superior violinist of the virtuoso school; more remarkable for exact execution, "regular" reading, and objective style, than for impulsive feeling, or the passion that proceeds from souls set on fire by their texts. Mr. Holmes led Schubert's quartet with the skill and savoir faire of a veteran, and was twice recalled after his solos. The "Ballade" of the late Alfred Holmes, a self-taught musician, is worthy of the artist's elder brother; this greatly to be respected musician, after doing much good work for his art, died in Paris about seven years ago.

Spohr highly esteemed both brothers, and was never slack to express his friendly sentiments towards them. The Scherzo in D major, a graceful trifle, was first introduced by Herr Joachim in 1866.

Mdlle. Krebs won the encore of the evening, after her intelligent reading of Bach's piece, said, by the annotator of the book, to be "one of the most remarkable, individual, and difficult pieces ever composed for a keyed instrument." I hope that the majority of the audience were able to follow this elaborately analytical review of the work; but I am, perhaps, morbidly sceptical! Mdme. Goddard—be it never forgotten—first played this fugue at the beginning of 1861. The vocal music calls for no comment; the artists were recalled, as usual. A.M.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

It was a strange chance that placed the two "Erdödy" trios on the programme of successive Saturdays, as they were not the choice of the same pianist or violinist; but it was a chance not to be quarrelled with, for they rank among the most genial and individual, though not among the grandest, of Beethoven's works.

No disrespect to Haydn is intended, but it was decidedly disappointing to find that one of his quartets had been substituted at the eleventh hour for the promised movements by Schubert. Mr. Henry Holmes is an effective leader, and the rendering of both quartet and trio was satisfactory, though Mdme. Frickenhaus might have made more of her part in the latter work. Her reading of the sonata, too, was tame and uninteresting; but the piece she selected as an "encore" went far more spiritedly: it was the novelette from Schumann's Op. 99—not one of the grander set of eight, which is Op. 21, dedicated to Henselt.

The honour of encores was fairly distributed. Signor Piatti gave with much taste and feeling a transcription of Schubert's "Litany," and Mr. Santley repeated Schumann's "Widmung," at the request of a portion of the audience. This insatiableness sometimes overreaches itself. It did in this instance, for Mr. Santley had thrown his whole soul into his delivery of this passionate inspiration, and what could follow but an anti-climax, though Mr. Santley is a genuine artist of the highest rank? Byron has said "I cannot get people to understand . . . that there is no such thing as a life of passion any more than there is a continuous earthquake or an eternal fire"; and Byron was right, though he might not have been able to make a popular concert audience "understand" it. BIRMINGHAM.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

The programme of the fourth concert of Mr. Stratton's chamber series, given on the 29th ult. in the Masonic Hall, was most interesting and well-devised. As customary at these concerts, a work novel to Birmingham audiences was brought forward, the selection on the occasion being an early work by the now famous Norwegian composer, J. Svendsen. The programme in its entirety was as follows:—

Sonata in A minor, Op. 19, for pianoforte and violin ..... Rubinstein.
Variations Serieuses, for pianoforte ..... Mendelssohn.
Octet in A major, for strings ..... Svendsen.
Ballade in G minor, for pianoforte ..... Chopin.
Quintet in G minor, Op. 17, for strings ..... Onslow.

The Rubinstein sonata is fully characteristic of its author, but altogether it is hardly so perfect a work of its class as others by the same hand. The two opening movements seem the most successful, the impassioned character of the allegro, with its by-themes of tender, yearning melody marking unmistakably the individuality of the composer. The subject upon which the adagio is based, however, seems a trifle commonplace, as far as this quality can well be attached to Rubinstein's work; and the ornamental embroidery of the piano passages, if sparkling, is not of the most original style. The concluding movement is of most intense and vigorous expression throughout, and the closing passages are highly effective. The work was very finely rendered by Dr. Heap and Mr. Ward, the style of the latter being eminently suited to work of this kind. Dr. Heap's performance of Mendelssohn's superb variations was most masterly, though the pianist at the opening seemed to run risk of endangering his climax by hastening the tempo, and playing with a little too much fire. The interest of this work should be gradually intensified. I liked Dr. Heap better in the second of his solo performances. It was played with the same mastery over the extreme and peculiar technical difficulties of the piece, and in the same refined and truly Chopinesque spirit, which characterised his rendering of the same work on a previous occasion. The opening movement of the octet of Svendsen presents for its first subject a suave, flowing theme, and the movement throughout is distinguished by a flow of pure cantibile strain. The structure of the work is very clear, and there is no such eccentricity remarkable in the themes themselves, or their treatment, as in the case of the composer Grieg, with whom it is, perhaps, natural that Svendsen should be brought up in comparison. The Scandinavian element pervades the work, but there is little decidedly outré about the composition—no barbaric rhythms or tedious confinement to a range of minor keys. It is the spirit of the Northern volksliedei and tänze that one remarks in the work rather than the actual adoption, as with Grieg, of such subjects in their entirety. These remarks of course apply to the whole of the movements. The scherzo opens with a weird theme of somewhat melo-dramatic character, fantastically instrumented, capriciously changing its sentiment in the alternating trios. The melody of the andante is like that of the opening movement, clear, lyrical, and flowing. A noticeable feature is its beautiful calando passages at the close. The charm of the entire composition, in short, centres in this simple lyrical force of expression rather than in any elaboration of structure or development. What may be lacking in this latter way is more than atoned for by the beauty and originality of what may be termed its essentially vocal character. As regards the workmanship of the piece, the composer either presents his strains in a broad flowing style by the whole force of strings, or the melody is delivered by a portion of the strings with simple accompaniment of the remainder, in which the pizzicato is noticeably a favourite feature. I did not detect much novelty in the way of harmonisation; but the figuration of the different instruments is originally and cleverly treated. The finale is based upon a subject of extreme joviality—one can imagine a rustic merry-making à la Teniers. A remarkable point is a vigorously-worked crescendo passage at the coda. The work was listened to with extreme interest, and the applause justly accorded the performers at the close was in proportion. The mosaic-like musical structure of the composer Onslow—peculiarly a favourite of players themselves—agreeably concluded the concert.

At the next concert Miss Constance Bache (sister of Mr. Walter Bache) will appear as pianist. A M.S. composition of the lamented F. E. Bache will be introduced, and a novelty (for Birmingham, at least) in the sonata for pianoforte and violin of Grieg (op. 8). Schubert's String Quintet (Op. 163) will also be performed.

The third concert of Messrs. Harrison's series was given in the Town Hall on the 5th inst. Engaging only artists de premier ordre, the directors enjoy a support which seems not to be shaken by the fault-finding of critics. There is, undoubtedly, a requirement always existing for musical entertainments of a lighter, more recherché kind than that afforded by "educational" concerts, to employ a doubtful term lately devised; and where the artistry is of the superior quality as that exhibited at these concerts under notice, the success which for so many past has rewarded the enterprise of Messrs. Harrison cannot be regarded as unmerited. It would be unfair, though, to infer that the policy of the Messrs. Harrison is based altogether on the star-system; till very recently it was only on the occasions when Mr. Charles Hallé appeared at these concerts with his orchestral company that we had an opportunity of hearing a symphony or any other important class of orchestral composition produced in a respectable manner. This period I am reviewing, if not quite antecedent to the formation of Mr. Stockley's society, was before this worthy townsman had succeeded in gaining that support which now so justly favours him. So, taking these concerts all round, there is something more to be noted than mere ballad-singing by heavily-paid vocalists, or instrumental performances which are simple displays of virtuosity. Messrs. Harrison appeal to all tastes; and, in so doing, they succeed in filling the Town Hall, which is certainly better than to present ambitious programmes, with scratch performers to execute them, and so get only an array of empty benches in the place of listeners In this so-called "educational" movement it is to be feared that we sometimes overshoot the mark, and press amateur audiences with advanced work before the popular taste has been rightly formed to appreciate it; the consequence being that we make musical hypocrites instead of musical connoisseurs. It is with the growth of popular taste as, according to Goethe's saying, it is with that of trees—Providence having well seen to it that their tops do not quite shoot themselves up into the high heavens. These remarks are made in view of the frequent disparaging criticism of these concerts—as to their programmes not invariably presenting a sufficient amount of "classic" work—most often by those who themselves have no critical appreciation of classical music when they do hear it—having some stereotyped "text-book" acquaintance with names of composers and compositions, and, on the strength of this, assume a taste they do not possess.

On the present occasion the artists engaged were Mesdames Marie Roze, Trebelli, de Fonblanque, Messrs. F. Boyle and Ghilberti (vocalists); Mdme. Sophie Menter appearing as solo pianist, and Mons. Musin as solo violinist. Marie Roze was, of course, the bright particular star of the evening. After the remarks already made it will be understood that a very detailed account of the pieces produced is hardly necessitated, the how being the attractive thing rather than the what. Mdme. Roze sang, "Tacea la notte," from "Il Trovatore," and "Lovers' vows" from Benedict's festival cantata "Graziella." The singer's splendid powers (though hardly showing at their best on the concert platform) were fully exhibited in these selections. Mdme. Trebelli revived successfully the aria from "l'Italiana in Algieri "Pensa alla patron" (sung in her usual impressive style), the "Brindisi" from "Lucretia Borgia," and with M. Musin's violin obbligato Gounod's "Quand tu chantes." Miss de Fonblanque pleased greatly by her expressive rendering of Cowen's "I think of all thou art to me," and Dr. Arne's charming "Cuckoo song"; she also took part with Mdme. Trebelli and the two gentlemen vocalists in a very welcome extract from Méhul's little heard-of opera "L'Emporté," "Oh! ciel, que faire"; and, again, with the Messrs. Ghilberti and Boyle in Bishop's light, pleasing trio "Maiden fair." Mr. Ghilberti possesses a very fine bass voice, and he was very effective in his selections. Pinsuti's "Minute gun," and Mr. F. L. Moir's "Gold," a song evidently intended for the popular taste, and recalling a song from Gounod's "Le Médecin malgré lui," known in England as "O wander through the world so wide." Mr. Frank Boyle has a very agreeable light tenor voice, and a most pleasing distinctness of enunciation. He sang C. Dick's "Voice of her I love," but was most praiseworthy in his most sympathetic rendering of the old Irish song "Snowy-breasted pearl." I should advise him to cultivate as a "specialty" this class of song. Mons. Musin obtained his usual hearty reception, playing with even more than his usual beautiful freedom and graceful transcendency over technical difficulties His pieces were Leonard's "Souvenir de Baden-Baden," Paganini's "Monochord" fantasy on the prayer from "Mosé in Egitto," besides joining Mr. Ganz in the adagio and rondo from Dussek's pianoforte and violin sonato (Op. 69, No. 1). There only remains to mention the incomparable playing of Mdme. Sophie Menter in the pieces chosen on this occasion. An etude of Chopin, a "lied ohne worte" of Mendelssohn (that known as "La Fileuse," or more popularly as "The Bee's Wedding"), and the more astounding than charming virtuosi transcript of Liszt's "Les Patineurs" (based on themes from the skating scene in "Le Prophète.") It is needless to comment upon the superb delivery of these items of the programme. Messrs. Harrison announce an engagement entered into with Mdme. Menter for a recital in Birmingham on the 22nd of this month; at the same time the announcement of their last concert of the series, March 8th, when Mr. Hallé and his band will form the prime attraction; Miss Orridge and Mr. Santley vocalists.

The Festival Choral Society gave recently another performance of Berlioz's "Faust," with Mr. Lloyd and Miss Davis principal vocalists (as on the former occasion, when I noticed the performance at length).

At the last concert of the Musical Section of the Midland Institute the instrumental portion of the programme was "educationally" representative of the composer John Sebastian Bach. BR.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Ash Wednesday evening Mr. Brnaby, conductor of this society, gave a performance of "The Messiah" at the at the Albert Hall, which was fully attended. The principal vocalists were Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Maas, and W. J. Williams (vice Mr. King). The chorus in G, "Unto us a child is born" induced the customary encore. Dr. Stainer was at the organ.

With the approval of Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., and of Professor G. A. Macfarren, Mr. Ridley Prentice is preparing a work which aims at imparting to pianoforte students a knowledge of musical form. It is entitled "The Musician, a Guide for Pianoforte Students: Helps towards the better understanding and enjoyment of beautiful music"; and its plan is that combining the study of musical form with the ordinary pianoforte practice. The first grade, now on the eve of publication by Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein and Co., accompanies the student through a course of study calculated to last from one to two years, the work analysed being extremely easy, and suited for beginners. Five other grades are to follow, of which the second, now complete in MS., is in the printer's hands.

HIGH WYCOMBE.

On Monday evening, the 5th inst., the Choral Association gave their second subscription concert of the season, in the Town Hall, before a numerous assembly. The following formed the programme :—

"The Daughter of Jairus"	Dr. Stainer.
Part-song, "Come, live with me"	Bennett.
Song, "The Children's Home"	Cowen.
Pianoforte solo, Polonaise in C sharp minor	Chopin.
Serenade, "Wake, in all thy beauty"	Cowen.
Part-song, "Night"	Blumenthal.
Song, "The Worker"	Gounod.
Pianoforte Solos—
Impromptu No. 2, Op. 142	Schubert.
Grand Etude, "La Fontaine"	Mayer.
Glee, "Thy voice, O Harmony"	Webbe.

The chief interest was centered in Dr. Stainer's cantata, which was now performed in its entirety for the first time in Wycombe; portions, however, have been frequently sung in our parish church. The work made a most favourable impression, several numbers being most warmly applauded. I think there is very little doubt that in time it will become a stock-piece with country societies, and it is to be hoped that the talented Doctor will give us another work of such unvarying excellency. The execution was excellent, the chorus quite maintaining their reputation, nor were the soloists—all members of the society—less unsuccessful. The unaccompanied part-singing in the second part was very good and much appreciated; several of the vocal solos were encored, and a like compliment was paid to the conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus.Bac., Oxon, for his performance of Schubert's "Impromptu," and Mayer's "Etude."

LEEDS.—The annual masonic concert took place in the Albert Hall last week. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Street (soprano), Miss Amelia Clarke (contralto), and Mr. G. H. Welch, of Durham Cathedral (tenor). The programme was an excellent one, and a glee party sang a number of glees and part-songs in capital style. Mr. W. B. Townsend was accompanist.

MEDICAL UNION SOCIETY.—At the conversazione recently held, an excellent selection of vocal music was given under the direction of Signor D'Havet Zuccardi; and some capital instrumental pieces were played by the West London Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Cave, including Haydn's 2nd Symphony in D, and an artistic performance by Mr. Viotti Collins of Vieuxtemps's "Reverie" for violin.—The Medical News.

PEMBERTON, NEAR WIGAN.—Mr. James Gaskell, organist of the parish church, gave his annual concert on Monday the 6th February in the Mechanic's Institution when Gaul's sacred cantata "The Holy City" and a miscellaneous selection were performed. Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., and Mr. Fred. Gordon were the principal vocalists, and there was an orchestra and chorus of 70 performers, Mr. Gaskell conducting. There was a crowded audience and the performance was in every way successful.

SWANSEA GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—This society held its first invitation concert under the conductorship of Mr. J. Matthews, organist of St. James's Church, on the 6th, in the Albert Minor Hall, which was well filled with a select and appreciative audience. Gade's "Spring's Message" was one of the chief features of the evening, the Swansea Orchestral Society rendering good service in the picturesque score of this charming little work. Solos, including the conductor's "Song of the Streamlet," were sustained by ladies and gentlemen of the class, and the part-songs, more especially Leslie's "Lullaby of Life," and Macfarren's "Sands of Dee" appeared to give much satisfaction. Desorme's pizzicato piece, "Serenade des Mandolines," was also received with much favour.

S. PETER'S, EATON SQUARE.—A well-chosen selection from Mendelssohn's "S. Paul" was given in this church at even-song, on the 25th ult. The ordinary choir (50 in number) was supplemented by a few additional voices. The performance from first to last left nothing to be desired. The solos alloted to the boys were marked by feeling, and in some instances showed a dramatic perception scarcely to be looked for; those taken by the men received full justice, and the choruses were always crisp and brilliant, not a point being missed. The service was Barnby in E flat, and went so admirably as to suggest the wish that the distinguished composer, formerly choirmaster of S. Peter's, could have been present. Why, by the way, in the Nunc Dimittis, is the verse "To be a light" separated from its legitimate context by the interpolated repetition, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," to the damage of the sense? It would be unpardonable to pass over unnoticed Mr. Sergison's judicious and masterly accompaniments, and his fine rendering, with much orchestral colouring, of the difficult overture to the oratorio.

OLDHAM.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company have visited the Theatre Royal, and given "Fidelio," "Maritana," "Bohemian Girl," "Faust," "Mignon," &c., the principals being Mdme. M. Roze, Messrs. Davies, McGuckin, Snazelle, &c. The chorus and band have worked well, and the operas have been well put on the stage. Mr. Houghton's recitals still continue, Mr. J. Greaves playing with success several of his own MS. works. He has been assisted by Mr. Smith Warburton, a baritone vocalist possessing a rare organ, who was excellent in Watson's "Powder Monkey." Mr. Tom Upton is a good tenor, and Master D. M. Greaves plays some good violin solos in capital style.

HONITON.—On the evening of Feb. 1st, the committee of the Honiton Cricket Club gave an excellent and high-class concert at the Dolphin Assembly Rooms. The weather was rough, but nevertheless a large audience assembled. The chief feature of the evening was the singing of Mdlle. Roselli; her voice is of extensive compass and remarkably flexible. In each of her songs she was much admired, as was also Mrs. McLees, who, with the aid of her accomplished daughter, Miss McLees, as pianist and accompanist, ensured the success of the evening. Messrs. Stilliard, Tozer, Hawker, and Dison (from the Exeter Cathedral choir) sang some part-songs, which were greatly enjoyed by the audience.

SOUTH LONDON MUSICAL CLUB.—The annual dinner of this club, whose locale is the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, took place at the Holborn Restaurant on Saturday evening last, with H. Gadsby, Esq., in the chair. About 120 members and their friends sat down to a most excellent déjeuner, to which full justice was done. After dinner the usual loyal toast of "The Queen" having been given, the chairman gave that of the club, associating with it the names of Mr. Charles Stevens, the conductor, and Mr. E. G. Richardson, the hon. secretary. This was received with enthusiasm and was responded to at some length by the two gentlemen whose names were associated with the toast. Mr. Davies, F.R.A.S., then proposed in a somewhat racy and telling speech the chairman and the visitors, and these were in due course responded to by Mr. Gadsby, and Dr. Frost respectively. During the course of the evening a selection of glees and part-songs, embracing Lachner's "Battle Song," Coward's "Peaceful, slumb'ring," Mellon's "Crowned with clusters"; Horsley's "Nymphs of the forest; Storch's "Drowsy woods"; Macfarren's "King Canute"; and Otto's "Chinese March" were sung by the active members of the society, and solos were also well given by three members, Mr. C. Pompe, Mr. E. G. Richardson and Mr. Cranch.

DUNDEE.—On Jan. 29th a meeting was held in the Hall of the Dundee Young Men's Christian Association to present Mr. Henry Nagel with a cheque for £1000, a valuable gold watch, and a handsome silver jug, on the occasion of his retirement from the leadership of the Dundee Amateur Choral Union, a position he has held for twenty-five years. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen. Provost Moncur presided, and among those on the platform were—Colonel Walker, Mr. J. J. Weinberg, Mr. V. Fraenkl, Mr. James Brebner, Mr. George S. Lamb, and Mr. R. A. Miller, Mr. Henry Durlac, Mr. Montague Cannon, Dr. Greig, Mr. William Kerr, Mr A. O. Parker, Mr. James Johnston, etc. The number of contributors to this well-deserved testimonial numbered no less than 306, and the total sum subscribed came to £1,116 3s. 6d. After defraying the cost of the above valuable articles, it is the intention of the committee to invest the remaining £20 in some remembrance for Mrs. Nagel. The names of the subscribers, alphabetically arranged, are to be written on vellum, with the following inscription, which appears also on the watch and jug :—"Presented to Mr. Henry Nagel, with a gold watch, silver jug, and one thousand pounds, by the following subscribers, as a recognition of his long and arduous services to the cause of music in Dundee, and more particularly of his valuable work as conductor of the Dundee Amateur Choral Union, which position he filled gratuitously for the long period of twenty-five years. Dundee, 29th January, 1883."

While learned societies are exerting themselves to procure a version of our National Anthem suited to the people of India, a native poet and composer in Calcutta, Mr. Bowmanjee Cursetjee Bandoopwalla, has come forward with an entirely new patriotic and loyal song, consisting of five stanzas set to original music. They commence with the following curious lines—

India's land and Iadia's shore
Had some latent in store;
Now the happy event to aggrandize
When all our hopes be realized
Has at length arrived.
God bless the Empress!

In referring to this well-meant effort of loyalty, the Calcutta Englishman observes that while the time is eccentric, according to European notions, the tune is less unintelligible than the words, and in parts sounds very like a plagiarism of one of our most beautiful hymn-tunes, Signor Ponchielli's "I Promessi Sposi" has had a successful hearing in Venice.

The death of Signor G. G. Guidi at Florence is announced. He was much esteemed as an editor and writer on musical topics, and founded the paper Boccherini.

Some days since the death was announced of Signor Tamberlik at Cadiz. This report has now been contradicted by the eminent tenor himself, who says that he was never in better health.

The first performance of "Henry VIII." at the Paris Opéra will take place on the 20th or 28th of this month. The following was last week's programme at the Opéra:—"Aïda," "Le Prophète," "Guillaume Tell," "Faust," and "Hamlet." At the Opéra Comique these works were given: "Les Noces de Figaro," "Giralda," "Battez Philidor," "Le Chalêt," "Les Dragons de Villars," "L'Amour Médecin," "Fra Diavolo," "Le Maçon," "Pré aux Clercs," "Richard," "La Dame Blanche," "La Fille du Régiment." Three morning performances were given at the Opéra Comique, which accounts for the unusual number of works performed.

HAYDN'S "OX MINUET."

Translated from the Neue Musiker Zeitung by Miss E. E. SOUTHGATE.

In the year 1787, when Haydn was Music Director to Prince Esterhazy, he was sitting at the piano in his comfortable dwelling engaged in the composition of one of his finest symphonies. Shortly previous to the event narrated, he had received a flattering invitation from Prague, viz.: to compose an opera for the theatre there. Haydn, with much modesty and tact, declined the honour, declaring, in a decided manner, that he did not consider himself important enough to contend for a prize against the great Mozart. Haydn was interrupted in his work by a loud knocking at his door; as the visitor received an invitation to enter, there appeared in the room a broad-shouldered stout man, in the dress of a well-to-do Hungarian farmer. He greeted Haydn politely, and strengthened his greeting by so forcible a shake of the hand, that the grip gave some pain to the soft palm of the genial Kapellmeister. "Beg pardon, your honour, if I disturb," said the new-comer, "but I want to ask you to grant me a favour. Your honour composes such splendid music that it sounds quite different to the fiddling and scraping of our gipsy musicians; as for example, 'The Seven Last Words,' which I heard last Sunday in our church (for I am always the first at church when the oratorio, or any little song from your beautiful Masses is given.)" The frank bearing of the man touched Haydn; he invited him to take a seat, and state his request. "Because your honour is kind hearted," said the man, "I hope that you would willingly write a little bit of music for me." The Kapellmeister could not forbear smiling. It is true he had received many important commissions for works for churches and concert-rooms, but as yet no one had spoken to him from so homely a side. However, he was far from being offended; on the contrary, he was rather pleased about it. "Now let us hear," said Haydn kindly, "for what purpose you want your music—something for your church, or for a funeral?" "Oh, bother your funeral! Your honour, I want the little piece for a much gayer occasion. The fact is, my daughter—I have only this one—is shortly to be married to Herr Fichtelhaimer, who is a merchant in Oldenburg, and is a very respectable person. As you have composed so many pretty things, which sound so merry that one's heart always laughs for pleasure, I should like therefore for this wedding a good humorous minuet—I mean just such a one as will make the feet dance the same as after hearing the pipe of the Rat-catcher of Magdalenengrunde in Könenberg. It is truly glorious, your honour, to hear an oratorio or a Mass with sweet angel voices; but I prefer a pretty minuet, so I beg for that, please." Haydn had a difficulty in hiding his amusement over the naïve comparison of his guest; but he was always willing to oblige, and declared himself ready to accede to the request. "A thousand thanks," said the music-lover, "My name is Zapolya—just the same as the great Zapolya, only his name was Stephen; but my nobility is quite as good as his, and I deal in oxen and swine, you know. I am a man that has wherewith to live, and that is certainly a good thing." The dealer in cattle promised to call again in a few days, and took his departure.

Haydn wrote the minuet at once in order to be rid of the thing, and put the trifle on one side. After a few days the noble Herr von Zapolya came again. He was delighted with the piece, which Haydn played to him once, and took it away with thanks. The Kapellmeister could hardly refrain from muttering to himself something about cheap gratitude.

About a fortnight passed. Suddenly, one day, Haydn heard music under his window, distinguishing, amidst more false than right notes, the theme of his own minuet. Curious to know what it meant, he went to the window and looked below. He there saw an uncommon sight: an ox decorated with leaves and flowers was led along, accompanied with music, and in the midst of the comical scene was the figure of Zapolya. The cattle dealer advanced towards the house, and soon after appeared in Haydn's room. "God greet your honour," he began, "I dare say that you wondered at the beginning of our acquaintance, and remember that as yet I have only thanked you with words for your beautiful minuet. Now that the wedding festivities of my daughter have passed over joyfully, and the minuet has set the legs of the old as well as the young in quick movement, I cannot fail to repay your kindness with my best ox. When you please to allow, I will lead him into the stall, for he is now your property. So now, God protect your honour's health, and may you enjoy the ox." The donor then disappeared. The ox was conducted to the stall, the melody of Haydn's minuet accompanying him. Haydn sold the animal to the Esterhazy Agency, and in after life rejoiced as much over the singular thanks he had received for the Minuet as over the fame accruing from his masterpieces "The Seasons" and "The Creation." The minuet of the tale has since borne the whimsical title of "Das Ochsen-Minuet."

MUSICAL DIRECTORIES.

By a mistake the passage quoted last week as from the Liverpool Evening Express should have been given as from the Liverpool Courier. In connection with this subject, the Express says:—

Professors of music—and by the term "professor" we do not mean everybody who chooses to dub himself by the name—have long had a special grievance to complain of in the absence of any definite standard of qualification for the exercise of their profession. It may, indeed, almost be said of the musical profession that, like that of ordinary teaching, it is a last refuge of those who have failed at everything else. If this description does not exactly apply, it is at least true that hundreds, nay, thousands, of persons assume the title of "professor" of music whose qualifications, if subjected to any adequate test, would be found utterly incapable of justifying the designation, and by their incapacity an honourable profession is brought into disrepute, the general standard of musical teaching is appreciably lowered, and the pecuniary interests of competent musicians are seriously interfered with. This disorganised state of the musical profession is ministered to, and in some sense fostered by two publications which should exercise their influence in the precisely opposite direction—the musical directories which contain the names not merely of men who have made music the study and pursuit of their lives, but of every butcher and baker and candlestick-maker who, after the regular labours of his day are ended, earns a few shillings by teaching or singing at concerts, or who on Sunday officiates as organist or part leader in some local church or chapel. The directories consequently lose whatever value they might otherwise possess as indices of the recognised members of the musical profession, and become mere registers of "amateur" vanity and incompetence. The cause of this confusion, however, is not far to seek. As the knowledge of music does not, like the practice of medicine or law, involve loss or injury to life or property, its profession has not been hedged round by the Legislature with restrictions that at once ensure the proficiency and define the status of its professors. For some time past there has been a movement in professional circles in favour of legal registration of musical practitioners as a necessary preliminary to undertaking the duties of musical tuition. There are many difficulties in the way of such a reform, not the least of which is the question of exclusion or admission of competent amateurs, who, with a limited amount of tuition, combine other means of earning a livlihood, but many musicians feel, and rightly, that until some such system is compulsorily adopted, the musical profession must continue to suffer both socially and pecuniarily in a way that is in the highest degree detrimental to the progress of musical culture throughout the country.

RICHARD WAGNER.

THIS great man has been called over to the majority, dying in Venice, where he had gone for rest and health, on February 13th at about 4 p.m. So much has been said and written about WAGNER, that it is hardly necessary now, even if it were a seemly course, to discuss at length his life work. It cannot be said that the principles he has forcibly and eloquently enunciated have so far produced such a healthy glow of conviction as will, according to present vision, produce a great school; for though his mannerisms have been to a small extent imitated, he has no successors. His death, it may be, will stand out as an extinguishing darkness warning us of the approaching close of the great musical cycle, just as other arts have closed their brilliant periods of productive power, to be followed by a wide-spread and intelligent mediocrity. His neglect, amounting almost to contempt, of the canons of the art, will now tell more against his fame as a genius of much power than it has yet done even in the heat of much prejudiced controversy; for the man of genius must live in the future to no small extent by his power of eloquence through the universally received impressions of order and mental prescience, through which the spirit of beauty is transmitted from one generation to another. The reputation of the man who feels called upon to violate the principles of the language he speaks, usually suffers when his personal influence and the power of his immediate followers are no longer present to ensure the seeming justification of such departures from the use of established idioms. In the end no man is strong enough to stand by his own eloquence, and the power of a great departed genius depends to no small extent upon the strength of solid, good workmanship, and the most precious thoughts are inevitably those which have been most carefully built up. Certainly the future fame of RICHARD WAGNER will have to undergo a sharper test in this direction than has yet fallen upon the work of any other kindred genius. His career offers a splendid and most instructive exemplification of the rich and varied powers possessed, but not always so widely cultivated by men of exceptional intellectual power. WAGNER was a philosopher in his own peculiar way, seeing in the arts a united sisterhood, whose different mediums of expression through the distinct organs of sight and hearing, were to be concentrated upon the setting up of one complete poetical realisation. Though in the burning pursuit of his great conception of the universality and unbroken sympathy of the sister arts, he often neglected to strengthen himself with the requisite technical power, his memory will ever live as that of the first great expositor of the cosmopolitan character of art in its own domains. The large, wide mind of the distinguished poet, composer, literate, and artist in the widest sense of the word, scanned the vast horizon of the art-world with a power of vision exceeding its actual powers of flight; WAGNER, indeed, dreamt of and pointed to greater glories than he even realized. Is there now vitality and originality enough in the world of music to advance upon this wide art-pathway combined with such judgment as will avoid the technical weaknesses and vain ebullition of eccentricity as so often marred the work of the aspiring author of the "Nibelungen Ring"? Naturally so large, reflective, and widely artistic a mind as that of WAGNER was one of slow development, and his works illustrate this growth with clearness. It might furnish matter for curious speculation, to trace out the general concensus of public opinion upon the different operas representing the several periods of his mental development.

WAGNER was born in Leipzig on May 22nd, 1813. From an early age his musical, poetic, and dramatic instincts displayed themselves. He commenced his career practically as the conductor of a small operatic troupe at Magdeburg, and in 1839 he was similarly engaged with another company at Riga. Late in the same year he proceeded to Paris with introductions from MEYERBEER, but Paris was not a rightly chosen home for WAGNER. His genius and courage sustained him now through years of misery and disappointment; whilst he continued to develop his varied mental powers. His real life of prominence began with the success of "Rienzi" in Dresden in 1842, "Der "Fliegende Holländer," showing a notable advance in the composer's method, was produced in Dresden in 1843, only to be heard in England in 1870; "Tannhäuser" also came out at Dresden; "Lohengrin," at Weimar, in 1850; "Tristan und Isolde" at Munich in 1865; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" also at Munich in 1868; "Der Ring des Nibelungen" at different dates for its different divisions during 1869 and 1870, the entire work being given at Bayreuth for the first time in 1876; and "Parsifal" at Bayreuth in 1882. In addition to these great operas, he wrote several choral and orchestral works, and a few pianoforte pieces, including one sonata and several songs. His literary labours included a large number of essays bearing upon art-topics. He is destined, however, to be judged and remembered by his remarkable operas, in which he illustrated so unique a union of large and varied powers, and in which, if he did not prove himself the founder of a school, he at least led the way to an operatic reformation, displayed a genius of a high order, and has shown himself to be the greatest master of orchestration the world has yet known.

OUR MUSICAL DIRECTORIES.

A LIVERPOOL Professor, Mr. J. J. MONK, who is well known for his earnest and consistent efforts in the direction of securing a better status for the English professional musician, has spoken out frankly about the present position of our Musical Directories, properly describing them as being unsatisfactory as to the reliability of the information they profess to furnish, and as tending to maintain the present disorganised condition of the musical profession. Mr. MONK is not alone by any means in his opinion; still, it seems only fair to balance considerations and difficulties from two points of sight, and it is possible to prove that not only is the compilation of a Musical Directory a difficult matter, but that its compilers are not altogether to be blamed for the erratic character of their work. In the first place, although something needs to be done in order to secure a stronger, more definite, and compact professional status for the benefit of the public at large, as well as for the elevation of our professional artists, the movement is one requiring serious forethought and much common-sense moderation. The clerical, legal, and medical professions are often pointed to as strong, well built-up, and definite organisations. Still, it may be asked, are there no amateurs, in the best sense of the word, to be found within their respective ranks, and whose names are included in their official registers? What should prevent men from the exercise of acquired skill? surely not any motive in connection with money merely, or the left-handed selfishness of some protective scheme or other. One might as well say that friendly hospitality must henceforth cease to exist, because the exercise of such a virtue militates against the interests of the properly licensed hotel proprietors. So long as a clergyman may rightly preach the Gospel without thought of gain, so long as the friendly doctor shall exercise his benevolent skill without thought of profit, and the barrister who does or does not practise, warn his friends to beware of the pitfalls of the law, so long will the musical amateur, with good motives and a real love of music hold an honoured and useful place in the annals of the art. Does anyone read Lord BYRON'S poems, CHARLES LAMB'S "Essays," or ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S stories with less enjoyment because they were originally written from the amateur point of sight? Or, to turn to music, are the compositions of MENDELSSOHN, FLOTOW, and KUCKEN of less value because their authors were practically non-professional artists? As I have before pointed out, it would be impossible to get the art-work of any nation done without the aid of amateurs; to take the organist class alone, an army of non-professional players are absolutely necessary, for there could be neither means nor teaching enough to support an exclusively professional body of organ players. Then, again, our non-professional brethren are often to be ranked as our best and most appreciative friends. By all means let us register the profession, or take such steps as will effectually stamp out rampant quackery and empiricism—nearly as dangerous as quackery itself. But let us view the question from a large point of sight, and not regard shortsightedly or ungratefully the often unselfish and frequently valuable, not to say distinguished labours, of our non-professional brethren. The question must be placed indeed upon such a broad basis as will enlist the interest and support of professional and non-professional artists alike; for, in truth, both sections of the artistic world are concerned in the development of real and fully attested artistic power. Until such a condition of affairs is secured, it is difficult to see how our Musical Directories are to be free from anomalies. If their publishers only announced the names of artists holding accredited diplomas and certificates, a large number even of our deservedly established professors would be excluded, and a goodly number of thoroughly competent amateurs would have their names enrolled on the given lists. To the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus.Bac., the musical world is not only indebted for taking leading action in the foundation of Trinity College, London, but also for taking the initiative step in the direction of the legal registration of musicians. Surely no one could object to the presence of the names of such men as the founders of Henry Leslie's Choir, and Trinity College, London, to mention only two distinguished amateurs, who have rendered signal service to the art, in a Musical Directory; and surely one is glad to know that the interest taken in music by H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh is genuine enough to take a practical shape, and the name of a Royal musician would surely be a gain to the roll-call of the artistic world. One finds with sincere pleasure the names of a goodly number of musical clergymen in one of our Musical Directories; nay, it must surely be a sign of the increased respect in which the noble calling of the musician is now being held, to find the name of the Dean of one of our cathedrals given in the same list; and be it remembered, that to our musically competent clergymen is assigned much of the task of elevating Church music and the position of its avowed servants, our organists and choristers. There is, though, undoubtedly a dark side to the picture, which Mr. J. J. Monk may well endeavour to expose to the daylight of public opinion. Undoubtedly, many who have no claims to such distinction are allowed to register their names in our Musical Directories upon the basis of such unworthy motives as the vanity of being considered members of the profession, and, worse still, from the mean desire to get music at reduced price, to get the commissions allowed to professionals on the sale of musical instruments, and, in short, to pander to that snobbish and despicable wish to cheapen, barter, and to unfairly gain advantages, which largely characterizes the too prevalent upstart mushroom pretensions of a struggling and competitive society. In this direction something should be done, though the evils of such a condition of affairs may only be uprooted by the general uplifting of professional interests, and the development of mutual respect between the professional and amateur sections of the artistic world. If commissions, etc., are to exist for the benefit of the profession, then our musicsellers and musical instrument dealers should be called upon to resist all temptations to allow such advantages to any save fully accredited and duly registered musicians, even though it may seem hard to some to send custom from their doors in these days of sharp competition. To this end, the first movement should be the proper registration of all qualified artists based entirely upon the ground of a proper qualification in each case, as are the other professional registers. Again, the public at large, should be urged to decidedly prefer the teaching of duly qualified musicians only. Then the publishers of the Musical Directories may be fairly called upon to make their works reliable representations of the legally registered list of qualified artists. Even now, our professional musicians might take decided steps in view of the more careful compilation of the offending directories, and they would find the publishers not unwilling to meet their reasonable wishes. At the same time, let us bear in mind that art must be served purely and loyally, and that money motives must be held as subordinate in the consideration of the advancement of the musical world. The chief concern is, therefore, the educational aspect of the question; only let our musicians fully prepare and equip themselves for their life-work, then they will certainly secure the loyal help and good-will of the large and indispensable army of volunteer artists, and the two sections of the art-world will then surely work together, to their mutual gain, and to the securing of the common good of all.

E. H. Turpin.

ÆSTHETICISM.*

It is strongly characteristic of the English people that when they are not altogether impassive and indifferent with respect to any new development or manifestation in arts, science, or literature, they are inclined to run to an extreme degree of infatuation in their enthusiastic worship or condemnation (just as it happens to be), of the thing attracting their attention. If this theory stands in need of illustration, we have only to refer to the unflattering attention which of late has been bestowed upon what has been dubbed "the æsthetic craze." Like most things having to pass under popular criticism, the æsthetic school has had to bear up under a deal of ignorant prejudice on the part of the public at large, and not a little wilful perversion of facts on the part of those who have undertaken to criticise its principles. The word "prejudice" is not to be taken as denoting any active or ill-natured attitude as far as concerns the public; it simply marks the readiness with which the British Philistine will accept any gross caricature of an art-movement, if put before it skilfully and persistently, as a truthful representation of the actual thing, while not caring—so long as it is amused—to investigate for itself, and so discover the veritable nature of the subject.

It would be absurd to become angry with those who have only derived their notions from Du Maurier's caricatures in Punch, or from witnessing Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's entertaining "Patience," because they may see nothing more in the æsthetic cultus but a passing phase of fashionable tomfoolery, lending itself, if not to actual ridicule, to amusing persiflage and parody. Nothing is so likely to kill any novel artistic endeavour as satirical laughter raised against it; and it is certain that if nothing more serious lay at the bottom of the æsthetic movement than what is generally represented, it would be in a dangerous way by this time.

* The Æsthetic Movement in England. By Walter Hamilton. London; Reeves & Turner (third edition).

The author of the little work under notice seeks to lay clear the deeper springs of the movement, while predicting for the æsthetic school ultimate recognition as a distinct typical growth of nineteenth-century art, just as in literature the "Lake School" of poetry marks the opening period of the present century.

The main tenets of the new school are those respecting—in the first place, the correlation of arts, the endeavour to effect a closer intimacy in art-practice between poetry and painting on the one hand, and again between poetry and music; and, secondly, the establishment of authority on matters of taste—as Mr. Hamilton says, "they even go so far as to decide what shall be considered beautiful, and those who do not accept their ruling are termed Philistines, and there is no hope for them." There are, no doubt, many who will put in a declaimer against the institution of any class arrogating to itself the right of pronouncing judgment without appeal on all questions concerning art, gifting itself with the sole privilege of stamping any art-work, as it were, with the hall-mark of its approval; but if it is reflected how long—from the time of the first professed æsthetician, Baumgarten—we have been in trying to arrive at the positive determination of the beautiful, of defining the nature and limits of each art (in which little result has been arrived at) such a solution of the difficulty appears the easiest, readiest, and, perhaps, after all, the most philosophical. The old maxim Vox populi, vox Dei, has, at any rate, been found to have no ground at all in the settlement of questions concerning art and taste in general. Mr. Hamilton has, certainly, in his interesting sketch of the rise and development of this movement, kept in view particularly the doings of the leaders of the modern school in the arts of poetry and painting, touching upon the sister-art of music, as affected by, or affecting, æsthetic culture, but very briefly. If no more extended notice is given to the later development of the musical spirit than a simple passing reference to Liszt, Rubinstein, and Wagner, this cannot proceed so much from any lack of representation on the part of music in this new art-development, as, perhaps, from a want on the part of the author, of a closer insight into musical matters which would enable him to pick up the threads of affinity, and follow out in the music, along with the other arts, its parallel course of esoteric development. And, again, though it would not be hard to demonstrate the like corresponding movement in our own artistic sphere, and refer the modern tendencies of each art to the same underlying principle which has influenced of late years all departments of art in equally the same degree, the outward manifestation of the same has not, in musical art, become so defined and prononcé as it has in the departments of poetry and the decorative arts. So, although Mr. Hamilton has little to say upon the part music takes in this new art-development (while not pretending to elaborate any profound philosophical theories in his light and agreeable discussion of the subject), for those who can supply the deficiency in the way remarked this book can be recommended here as a most charming, enlightening work on a generally misunderstood subject. It will be seen that æsthetic culture is no forced and artificial thing confined to a handful of charlatan posers, but arises out of the grand spirit of modern art, whose aim, as before said, it is to amalgamate perfectly the hitherto distinct forms. This, as well understood, is the underlying principle of the Wagnerian Drama. The whole tendency of modern musical art is in this direction. Even with purely instrumental music—and such without any decided "programme"—this striving after a more decided poetical motive is to be recognised as the distinctive sign of modern musical art. The consequential revolution in matters of musical taste has not been slow. Only comparatively recently has the music of Chopin been brought into vogue; while only twelve months or so back did we get to make full acquaintance with the transcendental orchestral compositions of Berlioz. It is useless to contest the fact that the "absolute" principle in musical art has had its day; the musician pur et simple is an anachronism. Of course (it is perhaps needful to say) we are not necessitated to shelve Mozart, Mendelssohn, or Haydn in following a new evolution of art. It is the contemporary artist we regard; if he is to "march with the times" there must be something else evident in his work than simple musical display, however ingeniously artistic the arrangement of the specific "materials." As far, too, as writers on art are concerned the ultra-conservatists would be wiser to conform at once. The Wagnerian Idea is pretty well a fait accompli: they may as well subscribe to it at first graciously as be left consigned in the end to the region of old-fogeydom. In song-composition it is natural that we look most particularly for signs of this more elevated artistic spirit. And it is gratifying to find that a more refined class of song-literature is becoming approved, in which endeavour is made to more intimately unite music with the higher order of poetical compositions. This inter-permeation of the arts being recognised as the grand feature of Æstheticism, the artist, whatever his special department, cannot neglect to take notice of whatever movements may be taking place in any other departments than his own, or any question affecting the progress of general artistic culture. On this ground (although, as I have intimated, our author does not sufficiently treat with music in this light) I have deemed it not inconsistent with the profession of this journal to bring under notice here this most artistic little work, and make it the text of these remarks, which might else seem altogether irrelevant. It will not be needful however to discuss the matter of the book in detail. The author, while showing himself an enthusiastic apologist, does not sacrifice critical impartiality; and so those musicians, "professional and amateur," who will not deem it utterly lost time in giving attention to a book not strictly academical and technical, or even directly bearing on musical art, may take Mr. Hamilton as a safe guide in a closer study of the æsthetic movement. Very many so doing are likely to have their opinions on this subject greatly modified. Mr. Hamilton deals in the first place with the pre-Raphaelite brethren, and gives an interesting account of their paper, "The Germ." He discusses next Mr. Ruskin, as critic, and the artists of the Grosvenor Gallery—the late Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Mr. E. Burne-Jones, among the foremost; and then treats severally with the poets of the Æsthetic school—D. G. Rossetti, W. M. Rossetti, Thomas Woolner, William Morris, Algernon C. Swinburne, and Arthur O'Shaughnessy. Mr. Hamilton keenly recriminates upon Punch for its over-done caricaturing of the Æsthetes. Mr. Oscar Wilde, who is generally regarded as the personification of the movement by those who cannot discern its wider bearings, is presented in a very favourable light; the sketch of his career is very interesting, and the poetical extracts show Mr. Wilde to be, undoubtedly, a literary artist of no mean order. No less interesting is the account of a pilgrimage made by the author to the "Home for the Æsthetes," at Bedford Park. Mr. Hamilton is successful in demonstrating the good that has been wrought so far by the movement in improving taste, not only in arts, but in matters of common life, such as dress, furniture, and house-decoration. Careful distinction is drawn between false and true Æstheticism. "Let it be borne in mind," the author says, "that that higher Æstheticism has nothing in common with the affected and superficial Æstheticism which has been forced into a hot-house existence by caricaturists, and fostered by those who mistake artistic slang and stained-glass attitudes for culture and high art. For herein lies the essence of it all: Real culture is a hardy plant; it will thrive where it has once taken root. Pseudo-Æstheticism may for a time be confounded with it by those who have learnt all they know of it from Punch or "Patience," but by no others, and it will fade away as rapidly as it sprang into existence, with all the more speed now that as a theme for comic writers it is nearly exhausted." It will remain for those herein interested to draw the parallel before claimed between the arts here discussed and music. But although Mr. Hamilton leaves us to do this ourselves, the underlying spirit of Æstheticism, as here exhibited, will be found easily discoverable in the musical tendency of the present day, although, as before pointed out, not assuming perhaps any such marked character as in the directions of poetry and painting, being broader and more general in its manifestation. Nevertheless, the distinctive features of what (for want of a better term) may be styled the Æsthetic cultus, namely, a superior decision in art-criticism, and the tendency to an esoteric and subtle form of musico-poetical expression will be remarked in our own department of art. The higher development of pianoforte playing may be adduced in additional illustration, to what has been already said, with respect to the tendency of modern song-composition—the most perfect representative of the latter department of superior musical culture being the German Franz. Mr. H. F. Myers, in a recent article on this subject (Cornhill), in discussing the merits of the artist Rossetti, speaks of him as "a member of that new aristocracy—that optimacy of passion and genius." A like optimacy makes its influence correspondingly felt in the world of Musical Art; and it is such an aristocratic spirit as this, it may in conclusion be remarked, which is neither breathed nor cherished in schools and academies, nor determined nor arrested by the popular taste.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The audience had again the advantage of hearing Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool, on Saturday last. The first piece was a 'Marche du Couronnement" by Meyerbeer, a fine piece of pageantry music. An Andante in E flat, by S. S. Wesley, and a stately old-fashioned "Rigaudon," by Tulli, formed a group of interest. Bach's C minor Fugue, Vol. 4, No. 9, was finely rendered, and received with great applause; as was an artistic and effective "Fantasia Pastorale" by Mr. Best himself. Donizetti's overture "Gemma di Vergy," made a good and spirited finale to an admirable recital. Miss Agnes Larkcom sang charmingly, and was received with great favour, being encored and recalled. Her performance of Bellini's "Casta Diva," and Haydn's "On mighty pens," greatly pleased musical critics. Mr. W. G. Wood was the accompanist. To-night Mons. A. Guilmant will be the organist, and Mr. Arthur Thompson the vocalist.

NEWGATE STREET.

The following is the programme of an organ recital given in Christ Church, by Dr. Charles Joseph Frost, on February 12th :—

Grand Chœur Dialogue	Gigout.
Pilgrims' March ("Italian" symphony)	Mendelssohn.
Sonata in A minor, No. 4	Rheinberger.
Fantasia, "The Storm"	Lemmens.
Christmas Offertoire in F	Wély.
Fantasia in E flat major	Haydn.
Allegretto in B flat major	Guilmant.
Toccata and Fugue in C major	Bach.

The event of a recital in Christ Church, Newgate Street, is one of unusual interest. It was upon the organ of this church that Mendelssohn was heard, indeed, he gave what may fairly have been called the last recital preceding Dr. Frost's performance of the other evening—save the performance of Mr. J. T. Cooper, as mentioned by an esteemed correspondent. It was here, about 40 years ago, that the great composer of "Elijah" revealed, in his own incomparable manner, the majesty and beauty of Bach's organ music, being listened to by Samuel Wesley, the first English disciple of the illustrious cantor of Leipzig, and many other eminent musicians. Then, again, the organ at Christ Church has itself occupied an important position in the history of English organ building and organ music. As originally built by Elliot & Hill, the organ was one of exceptional value and interest; but as rebuilt by William Hill it became one of the chief and earliest examples of the adoption in England—under the intelligent advocacy of Dr. Gauntlett, and by the foresight of the distinguished organ builder just named—of the German compass of manuals and pedals, and of the presence of a pedal organ of the exceptional capacity, in this country, of 10 stops. The success of Dr. C. J. Frost's very admirable recital of Monday last, before an appreciative congregation, encourages the hope that it was, indeed, only the first of a long series of similar performances upon this most interesting instrument.

THE DATES OF WAGNER'S WORKS.

I leave to our editor the mournful task of delivering a "funeral oration" in print over the great man whom the world has just lost. I only write to correct a (supposed) error of dates, as regards Wagner's operas, in the rather vague "obituary" notice of the Times (Wednesday, Feb. 14). According to Mr. Edward Dannreuther, in his interesting brochure on Wagner and his works, "Lohengrin" was not first performed in Switzerland, A.D. 1853, but (under Liszt) at Weimar, A.D. 1850. The dates of the production of Wagner's operas, supplied by my esteemed friend Mr. Dannreuther, are as follow, viz. :—"Rienzi," 1842, at Dresden; "Der Fliegende Holländer," 1843, at Dresden; "Tannhäuser," 1845, at Dresden; "Lohengrin," "first performed under Liszt, 1850, at Weimar"; "Tristan und Isolde," in 1865, at Munich, under Dr. von Bülow; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," in 1868, at Munich (also under Dr. Von Bülow); "Der Ring des Nibelungen," in 1876, at Bayreuth (the first two sections or divisions of the work were attempted at Munich, in 1869 and 1870); lastly, "Parsifal," in 1882, at Bayreuth. The introduction to "Parsifal" was performed on Thursday, at the first concert of the old Philharmonic Society. A. M.

Passing Events.

There are now fifteen Parisian papers devoted to musical topics.

The Kyrle Society gave Handel's "Samson" under the excellent direction of Mr. M. L. Lawson, at Trinity Chapel, Poplar. The organ was in the hands of Mr. E. H. Turpin.

A student's concert takes place this evening at the Royal Academy of Music. It will be seen that the public have the privilege of attending these very interesting performances by payment at the doors.

Mr. F. Dewberry, organist of Caius College, Cambridge, obtained the diploma of Licentiateship at the recent examinations at the Royal Academy of Music, the organ examiners being Dr. C. Steggall, Dr. G. Stainer, and Mr. E. H. Turpin.

Handel's "Messiah" was well rendered at St. Mary's Bryanstone Square, on Feb. 13th, by efficient soloists and a large choral force, under the conductorship of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast. The organist was Mr. E. H. Turpin.

The Kensington Orchestral and Choral Society will give a concert at the Academy Rooms, Tenterden Street, under the conductorship of Mr. Wm. Buels, on the 20th inst., the programme to include Mendelssohn's "95th Psalm" and Gade's "Spring's Message."

On the 4th inst. Sir Michael Costa entertained a party of friends at dinner to celebrate his 73rd natal day. The company included the Rev. J. E. Cox, D.D., Mr. Husk, Professor Ella, and Signor Perugini. I am happy to say that the state of the maestro's health continues to be satisfactory.

Mrs. Meadows-White (Alice Mary Smith) has set Kingsley's Ballad of the "Little Baltung" as a piece for chorus and soli (male voices). The Lombard Amateur Musical Society will bring it out under the conductorship of Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast at the Cannon Street Hotel, at their nextsmoking concert, on Thursday, March 1st.

Mr. Eustace Ingram, Eden Grove, Holloway, London, invites those interested in the introduction of organs into their churches to visit his factory during the present month, where an opportunity will be afforded for the inspection of a three manual and pedal organ constructed for the Parish Church, Calne, Wilts. The case is of oak, the design being from the pencil of J. L. Pearson, R.A.

A musical agent, named Schlesinger, the other day sued Mr. Hart, proprietor of the Star and Garter Music Hall, in Bermondsey, for £100 commission on the purchase of that establishment. Although Mr. Justice Stephen expressed a doubt whether the plaintiff could, as represented, be in a position to say that he could get the place for five or six hundred pounds less than anybody else, the jury gave a verdict in his favour.

Some items of interest to the musician appear in data to be found in a special number of the Gazzetta dei Teatri, relating to artistic life in Italy and abroad. In the year 1882 there were represented in Italy 45 new operas and 54 abroad. There were nine new ballets in Italy and only five abroad. The same year there died in Italy three Italian opera singers, and 38 musical composers. Of foreign artists there died 20 singers and 48 composers.

The very valuable and lucid lecture by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, on "Triads: their Relationship and Treatment," now being printed in these columns, by kind permission of the author, is being published by Messrs. Weekes and Co. in pamphlet form. The work will, in that form, be of much use to students for reference. Editors who may wish to reprint are referred to the author for permission to do so.

Mr. John Owen (Owain Alaw), a musical composer, who was well-known throughout both North and South Wales, died on Jan. 30, at Chester, in his sixty-third year. For many years he has taken an active part in the furtherance of Welsh musical education, and has been chosen an adjudicator at nearly all the Eisteddfodau held in the Principality. He was also a favourite conductor at other choral gatherings. His musical compositions were received with great favour in Wales.

Mr. G. Jacobi desires to contradict a report that he is engaging a band from abroad for Mr. Leader's season at Her Majesty's Theatre.

Among the large number of candidates examined recently by the College of Preceptors, the subject of music was not overlooked. In this department the examiners were Dr. W. Westbrook and Mr. E. H. Turpin.

Legal steps have been properly taken in America to prevent Gounod's "Redemption" from being re-scored by another hand for the benefit of too enterprising concert managers.

One of the features of opera in America lately has been the combined performances of Mdmes. Patti and Scalchi. The two ladies played together in "Semiramide" at Chicago with the greatest success.

The Bloomsbury Choral Association gave a concert on Feb. 10th, under the painstaking direction of Mr. W. G. Goodworth at the Richmond Street School-room. The programme opened with a musicianly anthem "Rejoice to-day," by Mr. Goodworth.

Miss Adelaide Thomas (pupil of Herr Pauer, and Prince of Wales Scholar, late National Training School for Music), gave an artistic pianoforte recital, at the Marlborough Rooms, Regent Street, assisted by Miss Mary Thomas and Mr. Clifford Harrison. The performance included an admirable selection of modern pianoforte music.

A valuable and interesting paper on "The Position of Choirs and Organs in Churches" was read by Mr. H. W. Brewer, before the Architectural Association, on the 2nd. The Builder of Feb. 10th reports the lecture and discussion at length, and gives a large and admirable design for an organ placed at the entrance of the chancel on an open archway. It is hoped that the paper will be duly presented to our readers.

On Monday, February 12th, an organ recital was given by Mr. John E. West, A.C.O., at the Memorial Church, Hackney Road. The works performed were selections from Bach, Smart, Wesley, Salome, Gade, John E. West, &c.; the "St. Ann's Fugue" (Bach) and "Air," with variations (West), especially pleasing the audience. Some vocal music was also admirably rendered by Mdme. Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. Bernard Fountain.

Sterndale Bennett's motet for double choir, "In Thee, O Lord," and an unpublished work of the same kind by Gounod, are the most important features of the four subscription concerts to be given by the Henry Leslie Choir under its new conductor, Signor Randegger. New part-songs by Henry Leslie, A. R. Gaul, Caldicott, and Ciro Pinsuti are also promised. The dates of the concerts are stated as fixed for Thursday, February 22nd, evening; Saturday, April 14, afternoon; and on the evenings of Thursdays, May 31 and June 28.

At a general meeting of the Bristol Musical Festival Society on Jan. 30th, it was resolved to hold a festival in 1885, and a hope was expressed that the Committee would be able to secure for the performance some great work by an English composer. The Mayor read a communication from the secretary of the Royal College of Music, intimating that the Prince of Wales hoped to open the College in May, and throw fifty scholarships open for competition; and the Prince's suggestion of local examinations for testing the competitors was referred to the Executive Committee.

St. Cecilia Magazine has a stirring paragraph. "The question of instrumental music in the Church is no longer to be confined to the organ. Dr. Gordon, of St. Andrew's Episcopal Church, Glasgow, lecturing on the subject a few weeks ago, ventured to say that 'if the Psalms of David were meant to be sung at all in the Church now, they were meant to be sung or chanted as they were of old—that was, with instrumental accompaniments, with the cornet, the flute, the psaltery, and harp, and last, though not least, the melodious fiddle.' After all, it does seem strange that the theatre should enjoy a monopoly of the orchestra while the Church must go a-begging for a harmonium or an organ." We must look out lest Scotland will gain upon us after all in the matter of church music.

The Querist.

Composer of Trio.—What is the name of composer of trio for A. T. B. "As a rosy wreath I bound," and where can it be obtained?—Orpheus.

Fundamental Chords and Discords. — In answer to "Student," Fundamental Chords are those chords in the key which contain a major third to the root, thus: the chords of the tonic, subdominant, and dominant are Fundamental Chords. Fundamental Discords are chords containing a discord which needs no preparation, thus: the chord of the dominant seventh, and the chord of the added sixth, are Fundamental Discords. In the former the seventh needs no preparation, while in the latter the fifth and sixth likewise need none. In Fundamental Discords the third to the root must be major.—J. Jackson.

THE EXPRESSION AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSICAL THOUGHT IN COMPOSITION.*

By E. H. Turpin, Esq.

Permit me to explain the reasons for my present attack upon your kindness and patience. It has struck me that students find their progress in composition considerably impeded by a want of systematic and methodised knowledge of the treatment of available ideas; and by a similar want of ready acquaintance with the appropriate requirements, and suitable adjuncts given types of ideas call for in order to secure their most advantageous presentation and development. And although I cordially applaud such remarkable and valuable additions to our musical literature as the works lately given to us by thoughtful and eminent writers, I am anxious to call forth the observations of those who are so well qualified by their abilities and experience to assist us in an earnest examination of the general principles and motive power, so to speak, of the art of composition. By way of further preface, I should add that my present remarks are simply intended for students, and will not trench upon technical ground. I must also claim your indulgence in another direction; I shall venture to call attention to certain topics which I have already spoken about. Our scientific men are apparently reducing their search after the sources of power at work in the universe to the contemplation of one great mainspring of activity, Electricity; there are signs in the world of art of a similar character, for the operations and impulses of all the arts are being traced by degrees to one common philosophical platform, and the government of artistic power, whatever may be the medium of its communication, is being demonstrated more clearly day by day to be based upon those simple laws of evolution and gravitation which have been erected by the All-wise Creator for the control of all things.

Permit me to add the explanation, that I have nothing of technical value to impart; my wish is merely to encourage my young student friends by very simple, and, I hope, common sense, words.

We are all practically familiar with the fact that even a fair knowledge of the grammar of any spoken language will not enable us to speak that language, although we know at the same time how greatly grammatical laws will direct and strengthen speech. These grammatical rules support, but do not prompt, the mental formation of thought; and similarly, the laws of harmony, invaluable as they are, do not compass in their operations the thought-creating processes of the musical composer. These mental operations are indeed as subtle and mysterious as are the wonderful brain processes which govern the exercise of will and its power over our physical and mechanical means of putting mental decisions into practical action and effect. Undoubtedly there are few, if any, who do not possess musical ideas, but only the trained musician has at hand the workman's skill of shaping and utilising such ideas to the full extent of their possible fruition.

Let me endeavour, however imperfectly, to trace some of the active principles of musical composition. The first motive power it is impossible perhaps to analyse. A direction may, in the first instance, be given to the composer's thought by an assigned task; he may be called upon to compose a work of a given type, he may be prompted by enthusiastic impressions derived from the hearing or contemplation of some masterpiece; or his mental promptings may arise from emotions having their origin in the affections, in the act of self-communing, and in the contemplation of the spiritual, mental, and natural wonders of the great universe and its Maker; the very thought of such contemplation indeed exalts this human life of ours. Such promptings last mentioned as arising from emotions of the affections, and from personal, spiritual, and mental power, are of course the highest felt by the composer, and the most powerful in their influence over his work. Granting a primary cause, the result may be described as primary impulse. The mood of the composer's mind will be tinged and coloured by human feelings, either joyful, sorrowful, expectant, or regretful. Then the tangible result or primary musical impulse will be in keeping, germs of tune expressive of a given state of feeling coming into something like a definite existence. Now, the musician's work is first brought to bear upon the material so far created. The evolutionary process commences in the power of the composer to select musical initials and fragments which by habit of mind are quickly and instinctively shaped into musical feet, having the life-giving power of palpable accentuation. The law of gravitation sets its mark at once upon the embryo thought. The idea is joyful, or expectant, and hopeful, then the tune particles arise from and return to some centre tone or other, upon major intervals of the scale ladder or harmonic range, which are most frank, palpable, springing, and healthy in their character. Or the idea is sorrowful, or regretful and reflective, then the melodic particles rise and return to a pivot note, upon minor intervals, with closely clinging semitones here and there—for the chromatic genus is the very mainspring of sensitive, sympathetic, melodic action—which are the most expressive and timid in their impulses. Now the composer begins his work in earnest, and looks round for his available machinery and tools; his rhythmical forms, time measurements, appropriate key and mediums of performance, his plane, hammer, screws and nails, so to speak. With an innate knowledge of the nature of the primary impulse of his work, he finds a suitable key, or the idea, most likely, has already formed itself in his practical mind upon some scale map or other, which in most cases, after reflection, he will not see fit to change. The evolutionary process is continued, the leaves of the musical tree begin to expand themselves into corresponding forms, musical feet of the same kind get welded together, their accents point their formation and division, bar lines rise up as the patterns are developed, and a phrase is definitely formed. Now the progress of the idea calls for a decision as to its more complete gravitation, the writer's mind seizes for the first time the extent of ground required for the building up of his thought; he requires so much length of scale, then a centre is fixed upon, his tune is authentic or plagal, or begins in accordance with the strong natural principle of tone-gravitation to adopt more or less elastic externals and to accept some mid-way pivot note or other. Now the sense of proportion, partly acting through rhythmical impulses, comes fairly into action: one figure or phrase will extend in either direction from the centre, to be drawn back to the magnetic pivot sound; then to sweep through another figure or phrase, again to return towards the mentally chosen centre-tone; so lines of melodic power and beauty, stretched over the still hidden though felt treasures of harmonic combination, are formed in obedience to the great universal laws of evolution and gravitation, and partly shaped by that sense of proportion which is the immediate outcome of these two great powers. Another immediate result of the operation of these natural laws is the entrance of logical influence—a musical sentence becomes a tone syllogism, distinct premises are formed by the action of the melodic figures in different directions, a musical thesis is to be followed by its anti-thesis, and the cadence points the conclusion, as it were. By the time the first sentence is completed, the general mood or complexion of the piece is disclosed; for every musical piece has its single or complex state of mind or mood; which may be indicative of given emotion or emotions, or may be descriptive of some natural and external influences. Look, for instance, at the two quick movements of Beethoven's "Sonata Pathetique," as expressions of impulsive, passionate haste; at the slow movement of the same work as a picture of self-contained pathos and sorrowful calmness; again, take the same composer's opening movement of the "Pastoral" Symphony, in which, by skilful reiteration of simple figures, the composer takes us into the drowsy, humming, brain-resting, sunlit fields; or, once more, contemplate the gigantic wilfulness and pungent humour of such a movement as the scherzo of the "Choral" Symphony. As a general rule, the expression and development of musical types of passion of an energetic or active type are assigned to quickly moving times, and calm, passive, or reflective ideas will find their natural expression in slowly moving measures. The varied rhythmical types, too, are employed with deliberation, in view of the particular kind of thought to be enunciated. Thus the usual 2, 4, and 8 bar sentences are employed, as I have had occasion to point out before, for music expressing vigorous health, frank and genial thoughts; contracted rhythm, as in the allegro of Beethoven's "Sonata Pathetique," has its special use in aiding the expression of impulsive and passionate ideas; and extended rhythmical forms add greatly to the enunciation of calm, large, and patient thoughts —witness the first movement of the so-called "Moonlight Sonata." Whatever the character of ideas expressed, the composer is pledged to the maintenance of various types of activity by which the life and circulation of his material is sustained. These are, apparently, of three kinds. There is the deep, underlying movement of the harmonic foundations or chord roots, proceeding in a procession of impulses somewhat slower than the pulsatory beats, which the composer must carefully regulate at a comparatively slow rate of movement, whatever may be the artificial speed of the music, lest the brain of the listener should become fatigued in the effort of realising the widely extended elements of the harmonies employed. Here one may note the extreme value of the modern forms of broken harmony, which enable the composer to sustain great amount of activity without calling for any strain upon the mind of the listener. Another thought connected with the subject of a comparatively slow rate of root progress is the selection of appropriate harmonies. When the melody to be harmonised is frank, natural, and marked by an absence of constrained or acute types of thought, the composer should carefully abstain from the use of chromatic, augmented, or dimished harmonies, as contradictory in effect, and should rely upon the more natural harmonic conbinations. He will do well, indeed, to regard exceptional harmonies as they were regarded by the theorist who proclaimed discordant elements to be chiefly contractions and extensions of natural harmonies, compressed downwards or extended upwards for the better expression of intensified sympathies and emotions. And, like a wary workman, he should be careful in the economy of his materials; and further should avoid the contraction of habits in the use of extravagant harmonies, which may become tokens of eccentricity rather than signs of eloquence. The next, and perhaps the most vital of the musical activities, is the preservation of the pulsatory beat. It might be shown that throughout the history of music the count-beat has never been greatly disturbed in its regular pace, and an examination of all music, from the simple plain-song to the most elaborate modern score will, I think, prove this, whether the count-beat be taken as the breve as of old, or the minim as in the Church music of the sixteenth century, or as the crotchet and quaver in our modern time measurements. The pulsation of a healthy man is about seventy-two per minute, and strangely enough the musical pulsatory beat varies similarly, with a comparatively small range, from about sixty to a hundred per minute, and deviations, either slower or quicker, are more artificial than real, for whatever the pace may be at which the music proceeds, the mind clings to some landmarks or other which represent a substantial and moderate rate of progress. The composer must, therefore, I take it, be fully aware of the importance of the proper regulation and maintenance of the pulsatory beat—which should be made to be quietly though firmly felt throughout somewhere in the harmonic strata, only to be stayed in the enunciation of ideas typical of surprise, fear, doubt or expectancy. It will not be necessary to enlarge upon this topic, for all will readily recognise the power the composer gains by the studied employment of properly adjusted pulsations. As the pulsatory beats must as a rule be somewhat more active than the procession of chord roots, in the general proportion of 2 to 1, or 3 to 2, or 3 to 1, in accordance with the varying impetuosity or calmness of the ideas to be presented, so the composer will have to resort frequently to the exchanging of chord positions, and inversions, and other devices by which harmonies may, as it were, be moved without being disturbed. The third kind of activity to be maintained is found in those groups of notes which, being shorter than the pulsatory beats, shelter as it were their recurrent throbbings, remove the laboured stiffness which would result from the too prominent enunciation of pulsatory power, lend grace to the melodic figures, and furnish a sort of useful background to the musical picture. The composer must select the details of this form of musical activity in keeping with the general tone of his ideas; thus the division of the pulsations into broken harmonies or underlying melodic figures of twos, will furnish a suitable background for ideas of dignity, majesty, or calmness; triplets will add gracefulness, amiability, and easy action to the expression of a given idea; and groups of fours to each pulsation will be available for impulsive, brilliant thoughts. Modern composers, in order to present the figure of melodic isolation, absence, contemplation or studied neglect, have pitted triplets against groups of twos and fours, and have so secured such positions by the apparent absence of the melody from the work going on and the general machinery in action around the central figure of the musical picture. Irregular and spasmodic grouping in this form of activity will produce a sense of sharp surprise, or even grotesqueness of thought; a too long continued irregularity will, on the other hand, invite weariness through its monotony; although some modern composers have fascinated by the dexterity with which they have produced a sort of perpetual motion by the use of rapid figures sufficiently varied and thin in outline to avoid the usual results of monotonous action. In writing rapid music, the artificial action must be chiefly diatonic, built up in natural and not unfamiliar details, and spread out in thin, transparent tone lines. If the student will go to the piano and play a number of separate chords in rapid succession, he will experience, through the sense of hearing, the same brain oppression which is communicated by the too rapidly moving objects of a panoramic picture. The proper distribution of definite pictorial objects not only seems to correspond with the judicious placing of the themes, but bears comparison with the judicious and never too rapidly moving or overloaded harmony.

Nowhere in England did the death of Wagner produce so great an impression as in the neighbourhood of Sydenham, for at the Crystal Palace his music has been for many years constantly heard. At other places in our own country conductors have been more or less chary of his music; but Mr. Manns, with his well-known cosmopolitan taste, has never hesitated to give the Crystal Palace audience the benefit of hearing his overtures and selections from his various works. It was therefore to be expected that on the first opportunity after the death of this great musician, something of his should be performed as a small tribute to his memory, and nothing more fitting could have been chosen than the magnificent march from Siegfried's death-scene.

The libretto of "Alfred" has been ably supplied by Mr. Grist, and first sets before us Alfred as a fugitive from the Danes. After a long love-scene with Alswitha, his promised bride, follows the well-known incident of his appearing in the Danish camp, disguised as a minstrel, when he proves himself as superior to the Danish leader in song as he does afterwards on the battle-field. The last scene describes the surrender of Guthrum, and his pardon by the generous Alfred, on condition that he and his host become Christian. It will thus be seen that the libretto is by no means ill-adapted for varied and effective treatment. Mr. Prout has not failed to avail himself of the opportunities afforded by the libretto; his well-known knowledge of instrumentation is patent throughout the work; his artistic and varied groupings of strings, wood, and brass are all highly effective, and his 'celli passages are now and again full of charm. The alternate groupings of wood and corni with harp obbligato are especially felt in Alfred's plaintive song, "Wail, my harp, in saddened strain." Upon the whole, the choruses are bold and well defined, but with no attempt at contrapuntal skill, whilst the songs are those of a musician, but lacking in freshness and spontaneity. In his recitatives Mr. Prout follows the old models; so much so that I remarked to a friend at the time, "Why, that is quite Handelian." The march near the end of the work was extremely well played and well received, and Mr. Prout, at the end of the performance, was much cheered by the audience.

The work was noticed in detail on its production by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association in the Musical Standard of May 6th, 1882.

The soloists, Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Bridson, were one and all very successful in their respective parts, and the Hackney Choral Society—which has been carefully trained by Mr. Prout—acquitted itself with great credit. A selection from Mozart's "Thamos King of Egypt," brought the concert to a close. R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

The success obtained by Mr. E. Prout's cantata, "Alfred," at the Shoreditch Town Hall, in May, 1882, was confirmed last Saturday at Sydenham. Mr. Southgate's admirable analysis of the work (which appeared on May 6th) may be referred to, and his general tone of eulogy will be not feebly echoed. Miss Marriott, however, did much to mar the effect of the soprano music by her lack of fervour, and want of dramatic intelligence. Mr. Prout has made an advance on his former cantata, "Hereward." I agree with a learned member of your staff in thinking the music of Mozart's "King Thamos" very interesting; so full of beauty, and carefully scored.

The "Dead March," from "Die Götterdämmerung," was played in Wagner's honour. It ought to have been played at the Philharmonic Concert, on February 15th, but the requisite tubas were not forthcoming! The "Dead March," from "Saul," does duty on parochial organs for every respectable tradesman or local nobody who happens to be officially connected with the church. It is no compliment now-a-days. A. Spohr's Quartet, introduced for the first time at these concerts within the last few weeks on a Monday, and repeated for the benefit of the Saturday audience in the above programme, is an important addition to the repertory of the Popular Concerts. How fresh, how genial and unaffected is Spohr when he is at his best; or, indeed when he is himself at all! This quartet is in the usual four movements and strictly in sonata form. The first allegro starts without introduction, with one of those simple outpourings of melody so characteristic of its composer—melody that flows without a break. On the other hand the striking effect of the accompaniment to the second theme commands attention by its originality. The slow movement contains a beautiful melody and an important episode, which has one of those rare enharmonic changes, "not made, but born," that once heard is never forgotten. The scherzo and trio is equal in interest to the other movements, delicate and graceful; while the finale—a true rondo, with a pleasing and tuneful rondo subject—brings one of the most equal, unpretentious, and pleasing of all string quartets to a close.

Mdlle. Marie Krebs was very successful in her rendering of the Studies, and obtained the usual encore. In the duet sonata—one of the most interesting Mozart has left us—her touch was occasionally unsympathetic, especially when her part was simply accompaniment.

If a performance at these concerts ever falls short of absolute perfection, the fault lies invariably with the pianist. Brahms's Quartet suffered somewhat from Mdlle. Kreb's failure to blend with the other parts. Her lamentable want of sympathy was positively irritating in the intermezzo, which the muted strings began so delicately without the piano; but there was an end of all delicacy when the pianoforte part entered and asserted its rights. This shortcoming was the more to be regretted as the movement is one of the most original and effective in the whole range of chamber music. Who can wonder that Schumann wrote enthusiastically of the author of this quartet and the Op. 26 in A major! It is vain to conjecture what he would have written of their author's later works, if he had lived to trace what followed the rich promises of youth.

Miss Santley introduced a musicianly setting of Longfellow's well-known lines "Come to me, O ye children," by Arthur Cecil, which deserves to be popular. In response to the double recal she repeated the last verse.

B. F. Wyatt-Smith.

M. von Zastrow's agreeable drawing-room concerts have been resumed at Glendower Mansions, South Kensington. One held last Saturday afternoon merits a passing notice. Mr. Bond-Andrews, one of M. von Zastrow's most accomplished pianists, played the first movement of Schubert's Sonata in A minor, Op. 47 (No. 1 on the list), also a Polonaise and Valse of Chopin, and (by desire) his own "Grotesque and Pastoral." The success was decisive. M. de Wolff sang with taste and forcible expession Balfe's fine song in G, "Good night."

For once, the weather was not wet! Creta nox notanda! Spohr's quartet pleased me quite as much as the latest one in E flat, twice performed at these concerts within a fortnight or three weeks. The second theme of the first allegro in G minor is "sweet" indeed, and quite redolent of the master. The larghetto, in C major, melodious, but hardly "unstudied," would seem to have been inspired by a pious meditation of Holy Writ, so religioso is the theme. The minuet and trio, full of grace and elegance, remind one of "Papa Haydn," and the finale, where the second subject is again given out—(pace Mr. Walter Macfarren)—in the "relative" major, may be cited as a fine specimen of spontaneous effusion, a gem of genius, bright, lively, and finely accentuated. I was glad to hail Mdme. Norman-Néruda again as the leader of the strings.

The director may, as a wag once said, reverence age, but he decidedly favours the young folk. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, a pupil of our own Academy, is really naturalised in England, and is not only a classical pianist, but a prolific composer of finest concerted music for the chamber. Her choice of the three pastoral pieces dedicated by the esteemed composer to his old friend Mr. Jas. W. Davison (how sadly missed in the hall), indicated excellent taste, both in a moral and musical sense. The few idiots who sneer at Sir Sterndale as a mild writer and a cold performer may be left, like Æsop's viper, to gnaw the file and break their own teeth. Would that we could hear the lovely sonata in A flat, "The Maid of Orleans," now and then. Miss Zimmermann played her sketches with unaffected grace, and on a recal—now the inevitable result—resumed her seat at the grand Broadwood to play a canon by Jaddssohn.

I like Gernsheim's duet sonata, which, of course, received the best of treatment at the hands of the accomplished artists. The work comprises an andante with moto in D minor, an allegretto in F major, and an allegro con brio in D major. The annotator rightly approves the piece "as agreeable to listen to, easily followed and understood from beginning to end, and happily not spun out to inordinate length." The composer threatens a fugue, but cuts the matter short. The "laying-out" for the instruments is admirable work; the violoncello expresses the very soul of the music, whilst the keyed instrument embroiders the canto so enunciated with affection and elegant accomplishments. Mr. Hallé and Mr. Arthur Chappell have introduced another of Gernsheim's concerted works (a pianoforte trio in F) at the Spring recitals and the popular concerts. The composer, a Hebrew, is a native of Worms, and 43 years of age.

Miss Thudichum continues to please the subscribers, and she chose a charming specimen of Schubert's vocal style, not to mention the air of Paradies.

Herr Joachim will reappear on Monday next to lead the second Rasoumoski quartet in E minor, and to play a chaconne of Bach. A. M.

P.S.—I am always glad to quote the observations of writers whom I respect, especially when they do not positively contradict my own views. There are no Popes in this world, theological, political, literary, or musical, and those who arrogate to themselves the title must be left to the stern rebuke of Mr. Pickwick, who, on a certain Christmas Day at Dingley Hall, denounced his friend Mr. Winkle as "a humbug and an impostor." The critic of the Daily Telegraph gives the following account of Gernsheim's sonata, the one novelty of this concert, and a work that must and will be repeated. The writer says:—

On one or two previous occasions Mr. Chappell has given amateurs an opportunity of forming an opinion as to Herr Gernsheim's talents. The decision arrived at was most favourable, and we may safely believe that it gained strength from the further experience of Monday night. In the work then presented we find a happy illustration of the fact, often proved, yet in many quarters doubted, that observance of classic form is compatible with the requirements of novelty, just as a Gothic cathedral may be, in general plan, like all other Gothic cathedrals, while in detail so differing from each as to give variety and afford scope for the architect's original ideas. Herr Gernsheim's sonata is of classic design, and at the same time a reproduction of no model. That it contains but three movements merely shows regard for the earliest sonata form, but the refusal of a "working out" section in the opening allegro is a decidedly independent stroke, worthy of observation though interfering little with the logical structure of the movement. While otherwise mindful of established rule, the allegro is treated according to the freedom of modern practice. Thanks, however, to its order and symmetry, it never becomes vague or degenerates into diffuseness. The second movement, an allegretto corresponding to the minuet (or scherzo) and trio of more strict form, offers a contrast to its predecessor by a distinct approach towards those earlier models which combine joyous and and unrestrained expression with scholastic language. Herr Gernsheim has fairly succeeded in a task of acknowledged difficulty, and one that becomes more arduous as scholasticism goes increasingly out of fashion. His music is good in structure and charming in effect—revealing a mastery of which we take pleased and careful note. The finale is much more modern, notwithstanding the feint of a fugue with which it begins. As regards that feint, Herr Gernsheim resembles the hero in "Cox and Box," who made solemn preparations for throwing himself over the cliff, took a run to the brink, stopped, and went home. This is a favourite trick now-a-days, and shows, perhaps, a saving discretion. No doubt it may be said that the great masters showed the way; but it is also true that they sometimes took the leap. Apart from its dallying with fugue, the finale belongs entirely to the modern free style, and here and there continues discoursing without having anything particular to say. Nevertheless, taking the sonata as a whole, we are glad to see it in Mr. Chappell's repertory, and ready to welcome it again and again. The performers did full justice to their theme. Indeed, the sonata could not have been, from an interpretive point of view, more perfectly laid before the audience; who, we may add, received it with instant appreciation.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first concert of the seventy-first series was given at St. James's Hall on the evening of the 15th inst. One is glad to learn that the season promises to be a successful one, so far as pecuniary matters are affected. The Subscriptions show an increase over those of any previous year, while the Guarantee Fund already amounts to sixteen hundred pounds. This fund forms some sort of test as to the estimation in which our old society is held in London. Among the names of the guarantors will be found most of those of our best known professional musicians and amateurs. There is little doubt that if the Directors were to take the trouble of making this feature more widely known, such a hearty response would be given to any appeal put forth, that so far as the sinews of war at least are concerned, the institution would be placed in a position thoroughly satisfactory. The long list of important, indeed immortal, works that have been produced during its time-honoured history, as well as the roll of its distinguished conductors, show that its aims have always been directed towards true æstheticism, and that the Philharmonic Society has established enduring claims on the gratitude of the world of music. It has seen younger rivals, whether under native or foreign management, die out, despite much trumpeting and high-sounding protestations. There are, however, some persons who maintain that the society exhibits signs of fossilization; while others contend that its Directors show a decided negligence respecting the works of Englishmen. There are not wanting indications but that there is a certain amount of truth in the latter accusation. Though art belongs to no country, the cultured music followers of London require that the best works of all contemporaneous schools shall be presented to them, yet it cannot be denied that compositions by our own countrymen naturally present the first claim to our attention. The only important provision they should exhibit is, to be up to the standard of the highest art requirements of the age. If, then, this necessity be only complied with, the Directors of the society should boldly produce such works, fearing neither the attacks of foreign, nor the sneers of unfriendly English, newspaper critics. There is too much competition, and there are more than sufficient active advisers to allow the Philharmonic to become fossilized; but those who move in musical circles know that complaints are at times heard to the effect that the society is too indifferent to English authors. It is said that the works already in their library are ignored, and that important novelties are often produced elsewhere, or meet with neglect at their hands. The request addressed to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie to write a symphony for the society, and the invitation lately issued to write a competitive overture, is a step in the right direction; but experience shows that commissioned works are rarely successful.

The programme of the concert was as follows:—

Overture, "The Naïads" ..... S. Bennett.
Chorus of Dervishes, Turkish March, March and Chorus } "The Ruins of Athens".... Beethoven.
Romance, "Le Vallon" ..... Gounod.
Mr. Frederic King.
Introduction to "Parsifal" ..... Wagner.
Choral Fantasia ..... Beethoven.
The Philharmonic Choir.
Solo pianoforte—Mdme. Sophie Menter.
Symphony in A minor (The "Scotch")..... Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Zeffiretti lusinghieri" ("Idomeneo") ..... Mozart.
Miss Santley.
Pianoforte solos—
Andante Spianato and Polonaise..... Chopin.
Etude in D flat..... Liszt.
Mdme. Sophie Menter.
"L'Invitation à la Valse" (arranged for orchestra by Berlioz)..... Weber.

Sir Sterndale Bennett's poetical overture was written n 1836, at a time when its gifted composer was yet a youth at the Royal Academy of Music. It was given in London at the beginning of the following year, and a few days afterwards it was played under Mendelssohn's auspices, at the Gewandhaus concerts, obtaining the admiration of all the listeners. This lovely work, with its haunting, graceful melodies, refined thoughts, and delicate orchestration, is so well-known and appreciated, that it is needless to dilate on its manifold beauties. The incidental music to the "Ruins of Athens" is a remarkable instance of the great composer's power of adaptation to local tone. Not that (according to the statement of competent authorities) the Turks possess any music of their own worth hearing, but still Beethoven's music, with its strongly marked rhythms and bruyant accents, pictures to one's mind coarse Eastern music, with its semi-barbaric features. In the case of the March, the marked effect produced by the emphasized accents is singularly effective. The choir sang the music well, but the chorus of Dervishes would have been improved by a little more vigour and fervour.

The death of Wagner, who was an Hon. Member of the society, was appropriately commemorated by a performance of Handel's "Dead March," the audience standing as a mark of respect. The prelude to "Parsifal," the deceased master's latest dramatic work, which was given for the second time in England (having been previously heard at the Crystal Palace) may possibly be effective in its proper place, as an introduction to the "Bühnenweihfestspiel" on the stage, but viewed as a piece of absolute music it cannot be pronounced successful. Of the drama itself, which has been described as exhibiting its materialistic composer's contempt for a religion he had no sympathy with, no remarks need here be made; but the brief description of the opera and its aims given in the programme-book of the evening, and the introduction of its prelude, are not without significance. It seems as if the way is to be gradually prepared for the production on the stage of this travesty of holy mysteries. Whether the thick and thin devotees of the eccentric Bayreuth master will succeed in their desire, remains to be seen. They should reflect that, though the English public laughed over pink-steam-vomiting dragons, magic swords, giants, mermaids, and other fantastic devices, of which Wagner's operas contain plenty of examples; yet the same public would probably view a stage treatment of "The Lord's Supper" with feelings altogether different. The prelude itself is but a poor specimen of Wagner's genius; it is of a sombre cast throughout, and its dulness is not relieved by any variety in the colouring of its orchestral tone. Mere chord-excursions oined together by jerky unmelodious fragments are not yet accepted as proper examples of seriously constructed music, nor does fertility in orchestral devices make up for poverty in artistic invention.

Mdme. Sophie Menter gave a superb rendering of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, a work in which the great tone-poet was evidently preparing himself for the gigantic Choral Symphony. Its brightness and regularity presented a startling contrast to the gloom of the preceding piece. The choral portions of the work were admirably rendered. Mendelssohn's highly imaginative Scotch Symphony (No. 3) was the most attractive item of the programme. It was indeed splendidly played, and the picture presented of Scottish scenery, character, and sounds, was indeed a treat to view. The symphony is probably its gifted composer's most original and poetical work, redolent alike of musical beauty, inventiveness, and picturesque instrumentation. Why Mr. Cusins disobeyed the directions Mendelssohn himself attached to the score, to the effect that "the separate movements must follow one another immediately, and not be divided by the elsewhere customary interruptions," one is at a loss to know. No gain ensued from this, but it rather breaks in the current of thoughts.

In Chopin's charming "Andante and Polonaise," Mdme. Menter was heard at her best; tone, technique, and feeling being alike most enjoyable; not so, however, in the study of Liszt. The composition may be all very well as a vehicle for exhibiting her extraordinary mechanical powers, but it contains no real music, and frequently led the pianiste to force from the pianoforte harsh, wiry tones, through the terrible blows to which the keys were subjected. Weber's "Invitation" is not a fit piece for a Philharmonic concert, and the suggestion made as to its novel freshness is amusing to those who have heard and admired Berlioz's ingenious scoring for the last quarter of a century.

"Gounod's "Le Vallon" proved a dull, heavy song, and Mr. King was unable to awaken much interest in it, in spite of his careful singing. Mozart's delicate song from "Idomeneo" suited Miss Santley's sweet voice well; her refined tone and tasteful execution gave general satisfaction.

Sarasate plays at the next concert, and a performance of Raff's "Im Walde" symphony is announced.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Feb. 21, 1883.

There has been nothing of any importance musically here lately, except the stormy meeting of the proprietors of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society held some few days ago. It seems that the meeting and its objects were illegal, but a kind of compromise was come to, and the committee of the society agreed to meet some eight of the proprietors and consult them as to the future of the society's working and the choice of a new director. I believe the real object the forty proprietors who summoned the meeting had in view, was the appointment of a conductor, which appointment will have to be finally settled at the meeting in May. There are very decided rumours that Mr. Charles Hallé is to be appointed to the vacant post, but I believe that, as yet, nothing is fixed or finally resolved upon. Englishmen would seem to be at a discount with the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, committee and proprietors alike.

There has been a large amount of correspondence in the local newspapers regarding the society, but a great deal of it has been chaff aimed at the forty proprietors who called the meeting of their brother proprietors, and then found that the meeting was not a legal one.

The Charles Hallé orchestral concerts came to an end last evening, when several items from the Wagner repertoire were included in the programme in memory of the great composer.

Mr. John Hodgson gave his second organ recital at St. Ann's, Aigburth, on Saturday afternoon last; the programme will be found in the proper column.

I am delighted to find that Mr. Best's salary as corporation organist is to be increased by £100 a year. Even with this increase the salary is much too small.

Mdme. Marie Roze is selected to sing at Mr. Lee's concert at the Philharmonic Hall, to be held early next month.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the Student's Concert of February 17th, before a crowded audience, the "Dead March" in "Saul" was played by Mr. G. J. Bennett, on the organ, in memory of Wilhelm Richard Wagner, at the commencement of the programme. The choir then gave a "Gloria in Excelsis Deo," by Hauptman. Amongst the pieces were Mendelssohn's 3rd organ Sonata well played by Mr. H. C. Tonking; two sketches for pianoforte, charmingly given by the composer, Miss Annie Cantelo; a Serenade with horn obbligato, by Mr. C. S. Macpherson, a student; Miss Kate Hardy sang artistically solos by Rubinstein and Schumann; Mr. Frank Arnold played, in good style, a violin solo; several other solos, vocal and pianoforte, were excellently given; and the choir sang Professor Macfarren's charming setting of Shakespeare's "Orpheus with his lute," and two artistic and graceful choral trios by Mr. G. J. Bennett, for female voices. The concert at once attested the excellency of the work done at this institution and its strong hold upon public favour.

UNIVERSITY OF DUBLIN CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Saturday last the College Choral Society inaugurated the season 1883 with Carissimi's cantata "Jonah." Sir Robert Stewart replaced the obsolete score by a more modern orchestration expressly written for this performance. The manner in which the band performed its part deserves particular mention, because the material which Sir Robert Stewart supplied it with helped the audience considerably in appreciating Carissimi's composition as it deserves. Mr. Walter Bapty's recitative singing also gave the cantata an advantage.

The following particulars respecting the composer are taken from the book of the concert, and may not be without interest for our readers :—

Giacomo Carissimi was born in 1580, and lived to the advanced age of ninety, greatly honoured and respected by his contemporaries. Kircher in his "Musurgia," mentions him as a master then living (in 1650) who had long filled, with great reputation, the place of Composer to the "Collegio Appolinare" at Rome, and the Pontifical Chapel. Carissimi exercised a most important influence in the progress of music by his development of recitative, which Caccini had originated. Other composers of the time also wrote in this form, but to Carissimi belongs the merit of having matured it. He was the first who wrote cantatas on sacred subjects, and introduced accompaniments of stringed instruments, thus laying the foundation of the present form of oratorios. It was from Carissimi's oratorio, "Jephtha," that Handel appropiated the chorus, "Plorati, filiæ Israel," setting it to the English text, "Hear, Jacob's God," in his oratorio "Samson." It is quite probable that Carissimi never heard his double choruses sung with more than one voice to a part. It will be observed that in "Jonah" there are several choruses in three-part writing, and the voice that has sung narration recitative is silent in the chorus that follows. This is a guiding principle, and can only have resulted from the absolute necessity of giving breathing time to the performers.

A selection from "Acis and Galatea," furnished the second part of the concert, which was attended by the members of the Viceregal Court. The conductor of the society may be congratulated on the brilliant auspices under which the present season has been opened.

MUSIC IN CHELTENHAM.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Ever since the opening of the season in October last, there has been a continual flow of music. It has been asserted that Cheltenham is not a musical town, and it has been observed in high quarters that it has no resident orchestra, but is obliged, like many other opulent and crowded places, to depend on overworked musicians of London and Manchester, whenever an orchestra suitable for public performance is needed. We have lately had very favourable exhibitions of local orchestras, consisting for the most part of resident musicians. I allude to those engaged at Mr. J. A. Matthews's Choral and Orchestral Society, and Mr. A. von Holst's afternoon concerts lately instituted. We have the material in our midst for a really fine orchestra. If a little more interest were given by local musicians to rehearsals, good results would soon be manifested. The performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio "Elijah," by the choral society above mentioned, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 13th, at the Assembly Rooms, was most successful. The band and chorus numbered about 150 performers. The work was exceedingly well done throughout, and reflected great credit on all who took part in it. The solos were well rendered by Miss Julia Jones, soprano; Miss Emily Dones, contralto; Mr. A. Kenningham, tenor; and Mr. Montague Worlock, bass. The latter gentleman made a good impression on this his first appearance in Cheltenham. He possesses a fine baritone voice of good power and compass, and sings in a most finished manner. The leader of the band was Mr. E. G. Woodward, and Mr. J. A. Matthews occupied the post of conductor.

Mr. A. von Holst's first afternoon concert took place at the Rotunda on Saturday week. It was well attended, and the programme, entirely instrumental, was exceedingly well rendered by our local musicians. The programme included Mozart's Trio in E flat, and Raff's Gavotte for piano and orchestra. Mr. von Holst played in a brilliant and faultless manner.

The Quartet Society will give its next subscription concert on Monday, Feb. 26th. Herr J. Ludwig, 1st violin; Herr van Praag, 2nd violin; Mr. Richard Blagrove, viola; M. Albert, violoncello; and Miss Amy Hare will preside at the piano. The programme contains Quartet in A minor (Schubert), Trio in B flat, Op. 97 (Beethoven), solo violin from Concerto (Mendelssohn), and Quartet in G minor, Op. 74, No. 3 (Haydn). This excellent society is doing good work and receives fair patronage.

The Mayor has received an invitation to hold a local examination here of candidates for the Royal College of Music. The local examiners appointed are Dr. A. Dyer, Mr. A. von Holst, and Mr. J. A. Matthews. The Ladies' College is granted for the purpose.

Mr. Joseph Maas is announced to make his first appearance here on March 8th at a ballad concert. The star system is usually very successful here, as in other places. Let us hope the programme will contain fewer royalty songs than we are in the habit of having at this class of concert.

I hear the Musical Society is going to honour its worthy conductor, Dr. Dyer, with a performance of his exercise, composed for his Doctor's degree, at Easter, in the Winter Gardens. This is worth noting, and I trust other native composers will receive the same kind of recognition. The work is a short oratorio; its title is "Salvator Mundi."

In addition to these leading events, many other musical bodies have given, or announce, concerts for local charities. Amateur concerts are always very profitable here, and ofttimes the performances are very creditable.

The Choral Society takes up Gounod's oratorio "Redemption" for practice.

CANTOR.

HAYDN'S "PASSION" IN LIVERPOOL.—The English adaptation of the above splendid work was rendered on Wednesday, the 14th inst., at St. Jude's Church, by Mr. R. W. Banner's well-known choir in a most efficient manner, and will be repeated each Wednesday in Lent. This is certainly an innovation in the right direction in Liverpool, for Lenten services, as a rule, have commended themselves but little to the sympathies of the congregations. On this occasion the superb strain of the "Seven Last Words" were listened to by an immense congregation, and seemed to make a deep impression on all present. Mr. J. L. Hughes was the leader of the choir, and Mr. S. Claude Ridley presided at the organ. It is probable that full orchestral accompaniments will be supplied for Holy Week.

GLASGOW.

The Choral Union season terminated on February 14th, and, for the present, orchestral music ceases to be performed in Glasgow. At the tenth concert, February 6th, the programme included: overture, "Oberon" (Weber); Symphony No. 3, "Scandinavian" (Cowen); Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in A (Schumann); Vorspiel to "Parsifal" (Wagner); overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner); some vocal pieces by Miss Julia Gaylord; and four pianoforte pieces by M. Louis Breitner. The leading feature of the concert was M. Cowen's symphony, conducted by the composer. This noble production was listened to with much interest by the audience, and the impression it gave was one of admiration and pleasure. There can be no doubt as to the place which this work must hold in the realm of British instrumental music, and we have no hesitation in assigning it the foremost place in the class to which it belongs. The young school of British musicians is rapidly coming to the front, and it is certain that, when the educational facilities now preparing are fully in progress, the pre-eminence held by the English during the 16th and 17th centuries will experience something like a revival.

At the eleventh concert Handel's "Samson" was produced. The vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott (for Miss Williams, ill), Mdme. Bolinbroke, Mr. J. Maas, Mr. H. Blower, and Mr. J. Bridson (for Signor Foli, ill). Dr. Peace presided at the organ, and Herr Manns conducted. The choral portions of the work had been efficiently prepared, under Mr. Allan Macbeth's direction, but the effectiveness of much of the work was lost through a too protracted performance. The cuts were judicious, but not sufficiently numerous. It would be much more creditable to the Choral Union if an annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" was made representative of the master's claims to a hearing. There are numerous worthy British musicians with oratorios well worth performance, and, it is thought these should be made known to the public through the agency of powerful societies like the Glasgow Choral Union. The effect of a general movement among our choral societies to encourage what is somewhat ambiguously termed native talent would be to raise the whole status of the musical art, and to do an immeasurable service to British musicians. The solo portions of "Samson" were only moderately well performed.

The concluding concert of the series was given on February 14th, the programme being appropriately prefaced by a performance of the "Dead March" in tribute to the demise of Wagner. The programme included overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (Nicolai); intermezzo, "On the Water," from "Jason" (Mackenzie); symphonic poem, "Mazeppa" (Liszt); overture, "A Midsummer's Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); variations for strings on the "Austrian Hymn" (Haydn); and Symphony No. 7, in A (Beethoven). Miss Marriott was the vocalist, in place of Miss Anna Williams (indisposed). Most of the items were familiar, and that which was the most pleasing novelty was Mr. Mackenzie's intermezzo. This piece is very cleverly wrought out, and gives rise to a desire to hear the whole work. The symphonic poem of Liszt it is difficult on a first hearing to judge, and one can only say that it is either a huge contemporary joke, or a work of vast genius only suited to the musical comprehension of a remote posterity. I have reason to believe that the orchestral performers were by no means delighted with it, either as a work of genius or a work for performance. A plebiscité was taken at this concert, as had been done at the previous Saturday Popular, and the result of the voting gave the following programme, which may be taken as a questionable specimen of the Glasgow musical taste:—Overture, "William Tell" (Rossini), 392 votes; "Symphonie Fantastique" (Berlioz), 432 votes; Overture, "Oberon" (Weber), 172 votes; Intermezzo, "Vergiszmeinnicht" (Allan Macbeth), 189 votes; Selection from "Rosamunde" (Schubert), 195 votes; Dance from the "Tempest" (Sullivan), 330 votes; Overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner), 423 votes. The voting in the symphony division of the works set apart for selection gave Berlioz 432 (as above); Beethoven's "Pastoral" 419, Cowen's "Scandinavian," 394, etc., while in the other departments the voting was similar in most respects to last year.

The Glasgow Select Choir will give a concert in St. Andrew's Halls, on Saturday, February 24th, the programme to consist of glees, part-songs and solos. Dr. Peace will also appear at the organ.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPOSER.

I.

THE admirable and thoughtful article on Æstheticism by Mr. Eustace J. Breakspeare in last week's issue, should command the careful attention of composers and students. The author points out that the world has discovered and to a large extent accepted the fact that the spirit of modern art is to "amalgamate perfectly the distinct "forms," to secure the "correlation of arts," which in music has caused "a striving after a more decidedly "poetical motive" as a primary action in the composition of tone-pictures. It is hardly the time to point out here that the great composers' works show us that this is by no means an absolutely new feature in the art, seeing that such works indeed prove the "correlation of the arts," in their poetical thoughts, shapely forms, and exquisitely proportioned parts; and, to go still further, one may assert that the spirit of beauty in each of the arts inevitably involves the expression of art canons forming the guiding principles of all art-life. However, to turn to the more immediate object of these articles. One of the most serious difficulties which meet even the well directed efforts of competent writers of music, is the obstinate reluctance of performers and audiences alike to accept compositions planned upon necessarily stereotyped forms. To take two examples, the world, broadly speaking, apparently cares for no pianoforte sonatas save those by Beethoven, and no organ fugues save those by Bach. This aptitude for conservative restriction appears to press more upon the producer of music than upon any other class of inventive artists. It may be that the great masters have supplied us with a present sufficiency of works built upon given forms, and, what is more probable, this restrictive aptitude results from a certain indolence of apprehension, and a still widely-spread ignorance as to the elasticity of established forms. Curiously enough, the poet may still successfully write sonnets, the painter may limn landscapes, and the architect build churches; undoubtedly the shortsighted restrictive attitude of the public mind as regards the musical composer is anything but true and liberal. Possibly our composers themselves have assisted such general ignorance and obstinacy with regard to this restrictive attitude in music by not aiming sufficiently towards the amplification, development, and expansion of the forms they employ. Certainly no single great composer can be named who failed in some direction or other to amplify the musical architectural schemes which formed the accepted mediums for the expression of each given personal display of thought, genius, and skill. The young composer will do wisely in giving some consideration to this special difficulty; and he should not allow himself to shrink from the task of conquering a narrow and unjust prejudice, even though he may desire to attain some present success by prudently approaching public appreciation through other form mediums than those apparently already monopolised, according to public opinion, by the great masters of the art.

LENT AND EASTER MUSIC.

The Church of England is rather conventional in its choice of Psalmody, especially for special occasions and particular seasons. Lent, by few practical persons observed in any fashion—"Seldom at church, 'tis such a busy life"—is the signal for gloomy tunes in minor keys.

Very often, especially at the week-day services, the organ is stopped, or "stopped off," entirely, in order that the contrast may be the more striking when the church-goers look up again at Easter, and jubilant music comes once more into fashion. Illogical clergymen often drop the "Te Deum" in Lent and use the "Benedicite" canticle instead; because, say they, the former hymn is too jubilant! If this be the case, surely the personification of the Creator's works, and the call upon them to glorify God in hearty praise, must lie open to the same objection. On Easter Day Worgan's Hymn in D, with its horrible scream on the high F sharp for the charity children (when the charity children form the "choir"), supplants the sombre tunes of Ash Wednesday and Lent; and flowers replace the sad violet drapery of the Ritualistic churches.

This year a slight difficulty of ritual occurs, already pointed out by a contemporary. For the first time in 139 years the festival of Easter falls on March 25th, commonly called "Lady-Day." Easter is a high day, the "Annunciation" of much less signification or importance. With regard to the music, this should be exclusively of and for Easter. It is fortunate that Easter so rarely falls on March 25; other days recur with sexennial or quinquennial regularity, but, as before stated, nearly a century and a half has elapsed since this extraordinary coincidence of Easter Day and the Annunciation.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

Third Series.

III.

The observation Cherubini makes with regard to the employment of the unison in four-part counterpoint of the first species calls for some remark. He says, "It "should be avoided as much as possible, especially "between the upper parts, where it is sometimes "tolerated. It is permitted between the two under "parts, provided this permission be not abused, and "that it is only employed after attempting every means "of avoiding it. The unison is open to no reproach "with regard to any of the parts in the first and last "measures." It should be noted that the unison is more objectionable in the first species, in which the parts move "note against note," than in any other kind, as under such conditions of part action the voices taking the unison do not only represent a rather prolonged weakness and stagnation in the harmony, but as moving absolutely together are less traceable and are more completely absorbed than is the case when two parts fall upon the unison together in the other species. All the same, the occasional unison of two parts for the moment sometimes not unpleasantly thins the harmony, and so affords the ear a slight sense of repose. Opinions will differ perhaps as to the preference of the unison between the two lower parts rather than between the two upper voices. The presence of two parts on the unison, and their approach to such a combination on the same sound, tends slightly to unduly strengthen that sound in performance in the mass of harmony, and it may be a question of taste as to which of the two, the lowest or highest sound, is most satisfactorily enforced in this way. Again, there is a liability when the preference—which the theorist himself inclines to—is in favour of doubling the lowest sound by taking the two under parts to the unison, that those two voices are moving too closely together for the best and most natural distribution of the harmony—an objection which does not exist when the inclination is in favour of the unison appearing between the two upper parts; indeed, the inclination of the preference for the unison being above rather than below, is in favour of the formation of the most natural and the brightest toned harmonic distribution. Anyway, the unison between two given parts should be quite exceptional in four-part counterpoint, especially in that of the first species.

The Royal College of Music is to open about the end of May it is thought. The Times the other day gave a long list of local examiners who are to test candidates for admission. Paying pupils are to pay £40 per annum, it is said.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

On Saturday last Mons. A. Guilmant was the organist. The programme opened with Fantasia and Fugue in C minor (J. S. Bach). The Prayer in A flat and "Scherzo Symphonique" by the player, both artistic and characteristic pieces, formed an effective group, resulting in an encore; an Andantino by A. Chauvet, and an Andante con moto by Boëly, received the same honour, and were charmingly played. The theme selected for Mons. Guilmant's improvisation was the "Bridal Chorus" in "Lohengrin," which was handled in a very musicianly and interesting manner. Wesley's "Choral Song" formed a finale to an excellent recital. Mr. Arthur Thompson, a very promising and artistic tenor singer, made a most favourable impression by his admirable performances. Mr. Wood was the accompanist.—To-night Mr. A. Carder will be the organist. His programme includes, by desire, the "March" in Tannhäuser."

THE LATE RICHARD WAGNER.

The remains of the departed composer were removed from Venice on the 16th, after due honours had been offered to the memory of the great musician. At Munich the station was draped in black. The musical societies formed in line on either side, each man bearing a lighted torch. Many ladies in mourning were present. The adjutant of the King of Bavaria, in full uniform, was the bearer of his Majesty's colossal laurel wreath. As the train slowly entered the station the funeral march from "Siegfried" was played.

The funeral train arrived at Bayreuth about midnight on the 17th, and remained at the station until the afternoon of Sunday, the 18th, when the interment took place.

The body was accompanied from the station to Wagner's villa by a large crowd and by many intimate friends, some being from London.

In Bayreuth numberless black flags waved from the housetops. The street lamps were covered with black crape. The shops were closed. Four black horses drew the hearse, preceded by mourners and bands of music. A procession, numbering thousands of persons, followed the coffin to the grave. All the Wagner societies sent deputations. There was some admirable singing at the grave, some of the best passages from Wagner's operas being given by the local societies of Munich.

A requiem was, it is stated, celebrated by the Hamburg Philharmonic Society, an institution quite as conservative, if not more so than its London namesake. The Hamburg Opera also had a performance in honour of the composer. Some surprise has been expressed at the reported decision of the Intendant-General of the royal theatres in Berlin not to give any performance in honour of Wagner. With regard to the fund to be raised for the deceased composer's only son, Siegfried, by special performances, the proposal of Mr. Angelo Neumann will most likely not be accepted. The King of Bavaria, the munificent patron and admirer of Wagner, will no doubt, it is thought, take upon himself to provide, if necessary, for the son's future.

Notwithstanding the not unnatural outbursts of enthusiastic and just now intensified admiration on the part of the deceased composer's personal friends and most enthusiastic admirers, the general comments of the Press have been characterised by such remarkable evidences of just discrimination and due appreciation as prove that the genius and life-work of the great musician are being carefully assessed by thoughtful writers, and that the world will be neither blind to his defects nor averse to the proper recognition of his varied and splendid powers.

MR. CHARLES OBERTHUR.—One has to note the return of this eminent harpist from Paris, where he has given a most successful concert. Mr. Oberthür, on whose shoulders it may be said the mantle of the Englishman Parish-Alvars, the greatest of all harpists of his time, has fallen, is not only a virtuosi on his instrument, but also the composer of operas and many valuable chamber-compositions. The Queen of the Belgians has presented Mr. Oberthür with a very valuable breast-pin, in the shape of a harp set in diamonds, in recognition of his talents.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

On Tuesday last, Prof. G. A. Macfarren gave the first of a course of four lectures on "Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues, by J. S. Bach." The interest, not to add curiosity, of the many admirers of the great Cantor of Leipsic, naturally added to what is ever an attractive occasion—a thoughtful discourse by the learned and much esteemed Cambridge professor and principal of the R.A.M. The examples received very artistic illustration on the pianoforte at, or rather from, the hands of Mr. Windyer Clarke, whose playing was characterized by admirable clearness and excellent phrasing. Prof. Macfarren opened his lecture by an interesting account of the composition and compilation of the Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues, forming the accepted second volume of the immortal "48." He then lucidly described the fugal form with its different component parts, together with its origin in ancient diaphony or organum, which was, according to Prof. Macfarren's belief, not sung in successions of 5ths and 4ths but rendered antiphonally, and represented an early form of canonical scoring. Very interesting amongst many most interesting features of the lecture was the tracing out of the foreshadowing of modern forms, as in the prelude in D, with the mixed twelve-eight and ordinary duple measures. The lecturer kept his large and appreciative audience deeply engaged with him in his intellectual and instructive lecture for about two hours, and at the close was applauded with every demonstration of satisfaction and delight. Mr. James Higgs ably occupied the chair, and moved a vote of earnest thanks to the lecturer. Mr. C. E. Stephens proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Windyer Clarke for his excellently played illustrations, and Mr. E. H. Turpin called upon the audience to acknowledge their obligations to the chairman, who reminded the audience that the course of lectures will be continued on Tuesdays Feb. 27, March 6 and 13.

MAIDENHEAD.—On Tuesday evening, the 6th instant, the Philharmonic Society gave their second concert of the season in the Town Hall. The chief choral works were Dr. Garrett's psalm, "Just Judge of Heaven"; Haydn's motet, "Insanæ et vanæ curæ," and Beethoven's "Hallelujah" chorus. The singing of the chorus was excellent and much applauded. Miss Cravino, as the soloist in the psalm, sang exceedingly well, her fine voice doing full justice to a most beautiful part. The chorus also sang several part-songs in the second part of the programme—Pearsall's "Who shall win my lady fair" had to be repeated. Vocal solos were sung by Miss Cravino (who was encored for a fine rendering of Sullivan's "Will he come," and Master Walter Luttman, a little fellow with a beautiful sweet voice, sang Dr. Bridge's beautiful air, "This is my rest for ever," with much taste and expression. Mr. J. G. Wrigley and Mr. J. S. Liddle, played the variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata, with great success; at the close they were warmly recalled. Mr. Wrigley also played Chopin's "Nocturne in G," and Mr. Liddle a barcarolle of his own composition, and an introduction and gavotte by Ries. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus.B., Oxon, conducted. The last concert of the season is announced for April 3rd, when Hiller's "Song of Victory" will be performed for the first time, with orchestral accompaniments.

THE HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARD'S ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—On Monday, February 5th, at the Warrior Square Rooms, St. Leonard's-on-Sea, the newly-established Hastings and St. Leonard's Orchestral Society, gave its opening concert before a numerous and select company. The principal items of the programme were Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," and Mozart's Symphony in D. In addition to these works, two pieces of chamber-music were introduced, as well as some lighter compositions for the band. The orchestra, being but in its infancy, was necessarily deficient in some of the wind instruments, &c. The overture went with considerable vigour, and augured well for the rest of the performance. A sonata, for violin and piano (Beethoven) was played in a masterly manner by Messrs. J. P. Morris and H. C. Nixon. Mozart's symphony was fairly rendered by the small orchestra; this was followed by Reissiger's Quintet in G, for piano and strings (Messrs. Nixon, Morris, Burfield, H. Muscat, and J. Elliott), the performance of which afforded evident pleasure to the audience, and elicited from them marked signs of approval, the violoncello solo in the slow movement being particularly well rendered by Mr. Elliott. Selections from a Russian suite by Wuerst, for muted strings, with violin solo, were played by the band (principal violin, Mr. Morris); these pieces were very pleasing. The concert wound up with a march by Lachner, effectively rendered by the orchestra. For a first concert, the society and its painstaking conductor (Mr. H. Muscat) may be congratulated on the way in which the whole of the music was performed.

MUSICAL DIRECTORIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—With reference to your leading article last week, perhaps you will kindly permit me to observe that in the Directories of other recognised professions will be found the names, not only of those in actual practice, but also of those who are entitled by reason of their degrees or other qualifications to adopt the calling if they should desire to do so. An examination of the "Medical Directory" will show that several of the clergy are included in the list (although, of course, they are not in medical practice), on the ground that they hold medical or surgical qualifications.

As, in the course of that article, you have made a most generous and undeserved reference to myself, I may add that, on the same principle, I should certainly claim to be included in any authorised Register or Directory of professional musicians, not as an actual practitioner, but as the holder of certain qualifications to practise, and I feel certain that others of my brother clergymen, who, like myself, do not live by the art, would do the same.

May I take this opportunity of suggesting that the more nearly our existing Musical Directories are assimilated in method and detail to those of the sister professions (notably "Crockford," or the "Medical"), the more practically useful they will be as a means of professional reference? Not only the source, but the date, of any degree or certificate should be given, as some kind of indication of the professional standing of the practitioner, and as a further means of verification.

In accordance with which suggestion, I beg to append an illustration of the method, and to subscribe myself, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,
H. G. BONAVIA HUNT,
Mus. B., Ch. Ch., Oxon (May, 1876).

ORGAN RECITALS AT CHRIST CHURCH, NEWGATE STREET.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In the "Passing Events" column of your issue of the 10th inst., Dr. Frost's recital is said to be most probably the first which has been given in the Church since Mendelssohn played there.

May I be allowed to state that, at any rate, one recital has been given at Christ Church, since Mendelssohn's time? for I well remember hearing a very fine performance by the late Mr. J. T. Cooper (for many years organist of the church), on April 13th, 1867, just after Messrs. Hill & Son had effected important improvements to the organ, including the completion of the choir and pedal organs.

Upon referring to the Musical Standard for 1867, I find that a notice of the recital appears upon page 261, Vol. vi. (old series.)

I think it is only due to Mr. Cooper's memory that his fine performance should not be forgotten.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
Anerley, S.E., H. HARFORD BATTLEY.
13th Feb., 1883.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—The Christ Church organ was built by Renatus Harris, in 1690, and I think Elliott and Hill repaired it, about the year 1842. Dr. Gauntlett used to play for perhaps half-an-hour at the close of the Sunday-evening services; but upon a change of vicar the performances, were, I believe, discontinued.

Yours truly,
Feb. 19. C. H. K. F.

A WORTHY EXAMPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—We hear so much about the darkness which is supposed to hover over the Provinces in musical matters, that I think it may be interesting to your readers to see what is being done in Salisbury, and what a brave fight a lady is carrying on there in the good cause. I therefore send you a programme of the first concert given by Miss Aylward during the present season. This programme is noteworthy for several reasons. In the first place, vocal music, which owing to the deficient education of our vocalists, and the mercenary motives which too often animate them in their choice of songs, has become a bane, both to the classical concert-giver and the more earnest portion of his audience, is entirely eschewed. In the second place, all the executants, without any exception, are natives of England. This latter is a point which I should be the last to insist upon from any false patriotism, and I only adduce it as a curious commentary upon the statement lately promulgated by a high authority, that if we want to hear good music well done, we must either go out of England or import the performers. That this programme is good music, will, I presume, be allowed; that it is well done I will pledge by word. Miss Aylward is a member of a famous family which has produced more than one star in the musical firmament, and we professors in the West Country look upon her with great pride, and wish her every possible success in her high enterprise.

PROGRAMME.

Quintet in E flat, Op. 16, for pianoforte, oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon	Beethoven.
Sonata in A minor, Op. 47 ("Kreutzer"), for pianoforte and violin	Beethoven.
Septuor in E flat, Op. 20, for violin, viola, violoncello, contra bass, clarionet, horn, and bassoon	Beethoven.

I am, yours very truly,
LOUIS N. PARKER.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In one of your late numbers (Dec. 30), is the following paragraph:—

"THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—A letter has been received by the Mayor of Liverpool from the Secretary of the Royal College of Music, in which it is stated:—'Provision has been made for two classes of scholarships. A scholarship may be founded by the payment of £2,500, providing education in the College and maintenance for one pupil in perpetuity, obtainable by open competition among all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The second form is founded by the payment of £3,000, providing education and maintenance, and is obtainable by competition restricted to a district or class, as may be preferred by the founder."

Permit me to ask what security there is that Parliament will never divert the said £3,000 from the district, or frustrate the intentions of the founder notwithstanding his having paid £500 to ensure them? I may be told that the Commons (who manage all money clauses) are bound in honour to respect the intentions of a donor or testator. Judging the future by the past, I say with Master Dumbleton, when he declined sending the two-and-twenty yards of satin for Sir John Falstaff's short cloak and slops,—that "I like not the security." The cautious silk-mercer required "better assurance than Bardolph's"; and so should I.

CONCERT AT READING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Permit me to call attention to one or two points in the notice of our annual concert, which appeared in your issue of 10th inst.

Your "Own Correspondent" states: "The concert attracted a large audience of the working classes." As a matter of fact the audience on the occasion referred to was fairly representative, and could not strictly be said to belong to any class.

Your "Own Correspondent" regrets he cannot yet report improvement in the singing, and asks, "Why do ordinary Tonic Sol-fa classes always seem so rough?"

This is not a Tonic Sol-fa choir at all—less than 20 per cent. of its members singing from that notation, and the roughness cannot, therefore, be ascribed to its adhesion to the method referred to.

As to Tonic Sol-fa choirs generally, I beg to instance the choirs under Mr. Venables, Mr. McNaught, and Mr. Proudman, and numerous others that are well known to your readers, and do not require to be named here. I ask, are these noted for their roughness?

Yours truly,
ROBT. J. BURROUGHS.

January 30.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I cannot help thinking that Mr. Burroughs has been quick to take offence where none was intended; but I shall be glad to add a few words of explanation to the "one or two points" of my report to which he has called attention.

The very designation of the choir is sufficient to show that it is intimately connected with the "working classes"; and by its programmes and prices I have supposed that it has wished to provide entertainment for them. This would be honourable enough in itself, and I hope Mr. Burroughs is not ashamed of my noticing it. I did so on this occasion because the body of the hall was well filled, and evidently, to my mind, by respectable working people. In this respect the audience differed from that usually seen at concerts in the Reading Town Hall.

Then, Mr. Burroughs quotes my criticism of the singing of the choir, and the question, en passant, "Why do ordinary 'Tonic Sol-fa' classes always seem so rough?" On this occasion, as upon a previous one, I could not help noticing the roughness of the choir, but in all kindness I ascribed it, by inference, to the material or the system; and, according to my observation, ordinary Tonic Sol-fa classes are rough.

The excellent choirs conducted by Mr. Venables and Mr. McNaught are very different from the ordinary provincial specimen; and I do not think either of the well-known conductors named would appreciate an implied comparison in this instance. These well-known London choirs I should call extra-ordinary examples of Tonic Sol-fa training.

But, then, Mr. Burroughs says that any roughness in his choir could not be attributed to the Tonic Sol-fa system, as it was not generally adhered to. The method of proceeding led me to suppose that it was, especially as the conductor, Mr. T. Waite, was advertised as "Graduate, Tonic Sol-Fa College, London."

In writing for a musical paper of high standard, I did not think it necessary to be blind to all faults, and flatter with indiscriminate praise. I will only add that I wrote the offending words without the least prejudice against the Reading Temperance Choir, which, I sincerely hope, will improve in good work, and not take hasty offence, or even discouragement, from a little kindly criticism.

YOUR "OWN CORRESPONDENT."

Reading, February 19th, 1883.

THE HUMAN VOICE.

On Saturday the 17th, a lecture on singing was delivered at the Royal Institution, by Dr. W. H. Stone, who exhibited some beautiful photographs which Mr. Behnke has succeeded in obtaining of his own soft palate and vocal ligaments in the act of tone production. These photographs were thrown upon a screen by means of the electric light.

For many years scientific men have tried, but in vain, to achieve this result, which will help to settle many disputed points; and the knowledge derived therefrom will be of great value to all teachers of singing and of elocution. These photographs are the first result of the joint enterprise of Mr. Lennox Browne and Mr. Behnke, who are actively engaged in embodying in a new and comprehensive book their respective experiences of vocal surgeon and of voice trainer.

ENGLISH MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

It is remarked, now and then, that Mr. C. Hallé does not display anxiety as regards the presentation of National music before his English audiences. The following letter addressed to the Editor of the Manchester Guardian explains itself—

"SIR,—I should like to express to your critic the gratitude which all musicians must feel for his outspoken remarks respecting the difficulties against which English music and its authors still have to struggle. His opinion of the melodic fertility of much of the German music to which we are condemned to listen, and for the sake of which English strains are thrust aside, is entirely in consonance with the remarks with which Dr. Hiles concluded the paper he read at the opening meeting of the Society of Professional Musicians, a paper that ought to be studied by all who could help on the cause of musical education. The Gentlemen's Concerts seem to be now at a discount. Is it not because the directors have been content feebly to agree to plans ready made for them? Let them exert themselves earnestly on behalf of English music, strike out a path for themselves that shall atone for past shortcomings, and they will not appeal in vain for support.—I am, &c., JAS. DAWBER, Mus.B."

OLDHAM.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company have visited the Theatre Royal, commencing Monday, Feb. 12th, and have given some well-known operas, foremost of which were Beethoven's "Fidelio," produced on the opening night, and Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" on Friday. Mdme. Marie Roze appeared in the principal parts of the same, and received able support from the members of the company, including: Misses Burns, Yorke, and Berry, Messrs. J. W. Turner, M'Guckin, Snazelle, Ludwig, etc. The chorus showed sighs of careful training, and the orchestra were well up to the work. "Maritana," "The Bohemian Girl," "Mignon," "Lucrezia Borgia," and "Faust," have been given before large audiences. The pianoforte recitals are still continued by Mr. Houghton assisted by Mr. J. Greaves. The programme of Monday contained Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata in C sharp minor, and various other classical selections, all of which were well played. Mr. Smith Warburton contributed Diehl's "The Desert" and Watson's popular "Powder Monkey Joe" and Master D. M. Greaves contributed some violin solos.

A morning performance of Mr. Sullivan's "Iolanthe" was given on the 15th, at which all the leading professionals connected with the London stage were invited to be present.

Passing Events.

Suppe's "Boccaccio" has been the latest attraction in Rio de Janeiro.

"La Belle Lurette," Offenbach's posthumous opera, will shortly be produced at the Avenue Theatre.

Spohr's "Jessonda" has been given very successfully at the Berlin Opera House.

Gounod's "Redemption" will be performed in Vienna on March 1st, under the personal direction of the composer.

Gounod's "Redemption" is to be given at Milan, the profits of the performance being destined to aid the fund for the sufferers from the recent inundations in Italy.

The Brightonian for the 10th has an excellent cartoon portrait of Mr. Alfred King, Mus.Bac., the corporation organist, and a highly esteemed Brighton professor of music.

The new opéra bouffe entitled "Le Droit d'Ainesse," which is now being played at the Theatre des Nouveautes in Paris, will be produced at the Strand Theatre next month. The music is by M. Chassaigue.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Norfolk Megone, gave an interesting concert (instrumental and vocal), on Feb. 22nd, at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street. The orchestra consisted of 70 performers.

Mr. F. Archer is just now giving a series of six organ recitals at the Chickering Hall, New York. The papers seem to agree that his most remarkable successes as a player are in the lighter and more brilliant pieces. Organ recitals are fast obtaining recognition in America; and the United States can show a goodly array of competent organ players.

M. Poznanski played some of his effective violin solos at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on Feb. 13th, and was to play at Stratford, Essex, on Thursday evening. These solos were De Beriot's "Tremolo," and Hansen's Fantasie on Scottish Airs. Mr. W. Ganz, at this concert, played with éclat his own "Galop de Concert," and took part with M. Poznanski in a grand duet of Thalberg and De Beriot on "Les Huguenots." Mdme. Patey sang the "Creation's Hymn" of Beethoven in superb style.

The Rev. Henry Macnamara, Incumbent of St. Paul's, Dundee, writes to the Musical Review that an Italian friend of his possesses the score of a "melodrama," entitled the "Mamertine Prison," by Giovanni Paccini, the once famous composer of "Sappho" and other operas. The scene of the action is laid in that famous prison where SS. Peter and Paul were incarcerated by Nero. The score is in the possession of the author of the libretto, the father of Mr. Macnamara's Italian friend, who is willing to part with the manuscript "for a consideration."

For the Edinburgh Orchestral Festival (the development through the exertions of Sir Herbert Oakeley of the annual concert in commemoration of General Reid, the founder of the Edinburgh Chair of Music, into a three days' festival), Mr. C. Hallé's orchestra was engaged, with Mdme. Norman-Néruda, Miss M. Davies, and Mr. Edward Lloyd as soloists. Admirable selections were given from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner, Cherubini, Rossini, Berlioz, Gounod, Raff, Sterndale Bennett, Gen. Reid, and Sir Herbert Oakeley.

The Western Madrigal Society met on Wednesday, Feb. 14th, under the conductorship of Dr. Bridge, and performed the following:—Madrigals: "Now morn awaketh" (Anerio); "Hope of my heart" (Ward); "Queen of the world" (Marenzio); "What then is love" (Ford); "When Cloris heard" (Wilbye); "My lady fair" (Ferretti); "In the golden sunset" (T. Distin); "Let me careless" (Linley); "Cold winter's ice" (Weelkes); "The Shepherd's pipes" (Marenzio); "O fly not love" (Bateson); "Soon as the silver moonbeams" (Gastoldi); "Phillis, go take thy pleasure" (Weelkes); "In going to my lonely bed" (Edwardes); Anthem, "O Lord, turn Thy wrath" (Bird); Motet, "Jehovah reigns" (Palestrina).

Dr. Stainer has lost no time in proving the earnestness of his endeavour to do justice to the Tonic Sol-fa system in his new position as Inspector of Music in Training Colleges and Schools. The advantage of having a practical Sol-faist associated with him in the work is obvious, and we are glad that Dr. Stainer has recognised it. On New Year's Day the appointment of Mr. W. G. McNaught as an assistant inspector was made by the Education Department. Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus.B., will continue to act, and it may naturally be anticipated that they will divide the visiting of the Training Colleges between them. The setting of papers is, however, a far more important matter than the visiting, and we hope that Mr. McNaught's appointment will work a revolution as regards the Tonic Sol-fa questions. For the moment, the whole attention of the new officials must have been concentrated upon the scheme for examining schools in singing by note. Our readers will, one and all, join in congratulating Mr. McNaught upon his appointment. From a financial point of view neither he nor Dr. Stainer are gainers; they are rather to be commiserated. But the possibilities of national work that lie before them are enough to stir the least generous mind. To do this work with tact and firmness, with a skilful, practical wisdom, and yet with a resolution that cannot be shaken, will tax all their energies and all their judgment. We assure Dr. Stainer of the hearty sympathy and best wishes of Tonic-Sol-faists for the new régime.—Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

THE EXPRESSION AND DEVELOPMENT OF MUSICAL THOUGHT IN COMPOSITION.

By E. H. TURPIN, Esq.

One of the most serious duties of the composer engaged in the expression and development of his musical thoughts is the act of fully engaging the listener's mind and attention, a matter requiring much tact, observation, and experience. This difficult task must be encountered at once, for the listener is sure almost to be unprepared for the fixed attention required, and will be almost inevitably pre-occupied in thought. This act of securing attention is very frequently accomplished by a slow introductory movement, in which stately reared up harmonies, striking, detached figures, seize the listener's fancy and compel his attention. The slow introduction has been well compared in its effects to the west front of a cathedral or other great public building which strikes the beholder's mind and prepares him for the grandeur of the interior presently to be revealed. Another comparison is furnished by our ordinary habits of conversation. When friends meet, they regard each other as unprepared for the interchange of thoughts and information of real present importance; in obedience to a really artistic impulse, they proceed by talking upon general topics, until a mutual understanding and prepared state of mind has been secured which will justify the utterance of important and confidential communications. So the musician draws his listener's faculties towards himself either by the striking introduction; or, if the character of his piece be too modest to justify so pretentious a beginning, or too impulsive to brook delay, he may plunge at once into his theme. But here his tact is not left unexercised. Still recognising the unpreparedness and possible pre-occupation of his listener, he takes care to present figures which shall be both natural and striking, so as to secure attention quickly, yet without alarming or overtaxing his auditor's powers. Then he has to communicate several pieces of musical intelligence: in the establishment of his accepted key, to which end he at first avoids modulatory or chromatic influences; in the indication of the general tone of his work, to express which promptly he selects decided, perhaps detached and suggestive, figures which help to strike and secure the auditor's sympathetic attention. Doubtful of this at first, the composer generally reserves his choicest and best sustained melody as a second subject. In the selection of the form or framework upon which his ideas are to be placed, the composer has a task deserving much consideration. He should primarily decide this matter in accordance with the general character of his work and their fitting ideas. The Duplex or Binary Form seems, from its scope for development and the travelling away for some time from the tonic, to be specially adapted as the medium of thoughts full of earnestness, containing fruitful germs of tune and prone to general activity. The fugal and contrapuntal forms are the best mediums for brief and firmly knit together figures which call for canonical or logical treatment. The Triplex, Ternary, or Episodical Form, with its well-defined leaning to the tonic, and not large tendency to development, invites the production of frank, calm, confiding, straightforward musical thoughts. The Rondo Form, in its older method or as now intermingled with the features of the allegro plan, with its frequent return to the tonic and simple, well-defined outlines, seems specially useful for the demonstration of happy, simple thoughts; and its frequent coming home, as it were, to the tonic, specially fits the form for use in final movements. Just as it would be inartistic to crowd large buildings so close together that they dwarf their different proportions, or to leave them so isolated that the vacant space around deprives the beholder of the charm and force of comparison, so would it be weak on the part of the composer to present important leading themes without their necessarily adjunctive accessory thoughts, which have the further use of supplying to the listener that relief which is wanted in the contemplation of great objects and leading features. Care must be taken, therefore, to secure the presence of several accessory thoughts of sufficient piquancy to command interest and to refresh by calling attention for the time from the more prominent themes. When all the ideas are ready to hand, the composer must secure some thread of similarity, which, running more or less through the entire chain of ideas, shall be kept sufficiently in the background as not in any way to detract from the different individualities of the several chief themes.

It is not possible to suggest any universally satisfactory method as to the order of writing. Different types of mind will devise different methods of mental exposition. Some composers have carefully prepared and trimmed the several themes before commencing in earnest the task of digesting them into a complete form; some have acquired the power of rapid and prompt composition with apparently little or no premeditation, as was the case with Mozart and Mendelssohn; others have accepted a well proportioned method to be used upon almost all occasions, as did Rossini in his operatic overtures; some have attained marvellous skill in beating out to the full the golden thoughts they have selected with admirable clearness and method, as Bach, Haydn, and some other great writers have done; and others have been oppressed by either the very redundance of their ideas, as was Schubert, or found difficulties from the inflexible strangeness of their thoughts, as did Schumann. I would venture to advise the student in composition to systematically select well contrasted and apposite themes, to choose a suitable framework for their exposition, and, in short, to decide upon the general scheme and leading features of his work without tying himself too rigidly down to given conditions before setting out upon his journey as a composer.

Though the several forms have their special features of adaptability to different purpose and types of thought, the principles of musical architecture are, broadly viewed, the same in all plans. The composer presents his themes first, for they are characters or personalities, his text or proposition; he proceeds to development, to illustrate the growth of his characters, or strengthen his position by the presentation as it were of musical arguments; and he finally draws his conclusion by bringing his themes home together, having completed a circle, and crowns, if he elects to do so, his work by a coda or peroration. It is important that the different main sections of his work should carry a sense of proportion as regards the length and consequent relative importance of the different chief parts of his musical structure. A piece of music may be described as a series of extending circles, the first theme being the first of the series, and it presents a complete epitome of the three principles of structure—presentation, development, and recapitulation, which in a larger sense govern the complete form of the entire work.

It may be that extemporization is more difficult to untrained minds than composition on paper. The original Samuel Wesley, as his son, our much-esteemed treasurer tells, when applied to by a pupil anxious to learn extemporization, answered to the effect that he could not tell how he himself set about extemporizing. Schumann, again, declared the real test of musicianship was to be found in putting ideas satisfactorily on paper, and that extemporization was a matter of comparative ease. Now, I am not sure but that the student, and especially the young organist, should not try to systematise and strengthen by mental training his powers of extemporary performance, whether they be great or small. I venture to think that such attempts to acquire the power of methodically thinking, would be further a useful adjunct to the general study of composition. To this end, the student might place before himself the small form of duplex sentences of about sixteen bars, as proposed on the examination papers of this College by way of test in the art of extemporization, skeleton fashion—that is, make out a map of some sixteen bars, inserting a proposed initial in the two first measures, and at the usual point of their re-entrance at the ninth and tenth bars, the vacant measures being filled up by the player ad libitum. Such exercise might with advantage be preceded by mentally formed decisions as to scale structure and balance and character of the melody to be formed, with the corresponding style of the harmonies. To this form presently a tonic pedal of a few bars might be appended by way of coda, over which fragments of the initial theme might be freely imitated. Other forms could also be adopted in a similar outlined form, with possibly notes of direction written over as to the best positions for cadence points or available small modulatory excursions and other hints. Of course I neither pretend to say that music can be manufactured, or desire to induce those gifted with tone-thoughts to chain themselves to mechanical schemes. I do, though, earnestly desire the student to realise the fact that the act of successful composition involves the skilled use of idioms and methods. To compose well is to speak a language eloquently, but the musician has the special glory and difficulty of conversing in a language set apart from all other forms, impressions, and idioms. He must, therefore, work daily and earnestly in order to secure familiarity with the art he practises, and in order to promote the necessary flow of thought required in continued efforts of composition. The student should be wary of being misled by the assumed freedom of the advanced school, even though it is well he should have a manly sense of self-respect as regards the methods he may select for the enunciation of his own musical thoughts. He should be careful to avail himself of all the machinery and appliances of composition rather than to deny himself the advantage of the help they undoubtedly afford. To neglect their legitimate use will place the student in the undesirable position of being a sort of voluntary artistic Robinson Crusoe, who compels himself to make his tools, as well as to build his own house, and who suffers from the usual disadvantages attending the use of badly made appliances and ill-shaped tools.

I will further venture to advise all students to study composition, for the contemplation of its methods and appliances must at least strengthen the intellectual faculties of the executive artist, if it does not indeed lead to higher results. It is needless, and I have not proposed to myself to attempt to expatiate upon the more technical branches of my subject; indeed, I must crave pardon for having so long tried your patience as my very indulgent listeners.

A performance was given in the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, on Feb. 28th, of Psalm lxv., "Thou, O God, art praised in Sion," composed as an exercise for the degree of Doctor in Music, by Edward Brown, Mus.Bac., New College. The work contains a number of solos, etc., and several choral numbers, illustrating the composer's academical attainments, and was performed by soloists, chorus, and a complete orchestra.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The programme last Saturday included the following:—

Symphony in G minor	S. Bennett.
Adagio for violoncello and orchestra (First time at these concerts).	Bargiel.
Allegro de Concert, for violoncello and orchestra (First time at these concerts.)	Davidoff.
Selection from suite, "L'Arlesienne" (First time at these concerts).	Bizet.
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3	Beethoven.

Vocalist—Miss Edith Santley.
Violoncello—Herr Hausmann.
Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

Schubert's charming overture, "Alfonso and Estrella," is not so often played as one could wish. Like most of his orchestral works, it is brimming over with fanciful passages, pouring forth a rich stream of melody, now tender and emotional, and now bold and vigorous, but never overstrained and always original. Why it took the place of his better known "Rosamunde," as announced in the programme, I cannot tell, but it proved an agreeable substitute.

Bennett's Symphony in G minor was most welcome. One often hears it at the daily concerts, but, strange to say, it has not been played on a Saturday since 1876. It is needless to say how much each movement was enjoyed and applauded, nor how perfect a model it is of musicianly skill and poetical feeling, nor yet how much it is to be regretted that the composer's time should have been employed in the daily round of teaching, thereby leaving him so little leisure for composition. The performance of the work was as near perfection as possible. There are spots even in the sun, but it is the sun all the same; the light overpowers the shade.

No. 3 overture to "Fidelio" is more than an overture in the ordinary sense of the word; it is a fantasia, a complete symphonic poem. Both Beethoven and Mozart were accustomed to write or play several overtures before selecting the one most suited to the work that was to follow. Shortly before the performance of "Don Giovanni," Mozart played three splendid overtures for that opera. The first was in E flat major, the second in C minor (a fugued fantasia like that to "Die Zauberflote," but totally different in character), and lastly the well-known one in D, which he subsequently penned so quickly. It is said that he could not be persuaded to write down the others.

Bizet's movements proved most acceptable, and Herr Hausmann's 'cello performance was as charming as ever. It seems ungracious to place the lady vocalist last of all; but it is due to no lack of appreciation of Miss Santley's merits, whose last song was so much enjoyed by the audience that she was persuaded by Mr. Manns to favour them with a repetition of it. SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Sextet in G major, Op. 36, for two violins, two violas, and two violoncellos	Brahms.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti.
Air, "Deh vieni"	Mozart.
Mdlle. Carlotta Badia.
Sonata in B flat, Op. 22, for pianoforte alone	Beethoven.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann.
Adagio in F major, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment	Spohr.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda.
A Hebrew Love Song	Salaman.
Mdlle. Carlotta Badia.
Sonata in D major, Op. 18, for pianoforte and violoncello	Rubinstein.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

Brahms's sextet, the second of the two he has published, was heard for the fifth time at these concerts. For heaviness and general unpleasantness it probably has no rival, if we except the same composer's violin concerto and a few of his other later works. Herr Brahms does not seem to be aware that it is quite possible for a composition in the strictest sonata form to be essentially "without form and void." Surely there never was a more notable example of Boileau's galimatias double—something which neither audience nor author can understand. Most of us know that when Corneille was once asked to explain an obscure passage in his Tite et Bérénice, he said, after carefully examining it:

Digitized by Google

"Je ne l'entends pas très-bien non plus; mais récitez-le toujours: tel qui ne l'entendra pas l'admirera." This may be also Brahms's opinion, but the general feeling at the Saturday Popular did not seem to be one of admiration, though the inability to understand was sufficiently apparent.

Even Rubinstein's sonata sounded fresh and genial after this most laboured affair, though of that the best one can say is—

Common is the commonplace,
And vacant chaff well meant for grain.

All that I remarked when this sonata was heard at the last concert in October need not be repeated. The first movement remains as prelude-like as ever in my mind, and the finale I still consider the most agreeable portion of the work. Perhaps a little more recklessness in the performance (especially of the wild, Hungarian-like second subject of the finale) might lead to better effects, and Miss Zimmermann seemed to recognize this possibility—I preferred her reading to Mdlle. Janotha's—but Signor Piatti was not to be startled out of his truly classical decorum.

Miss Zimmermann gave a thoroughly intellectual reading of the sonata she chose as her solo, and Mdme. Norman-Néruda called forth, at the conclusion of Spohr's beautiful adagio, one of those unanimous, ringing bursts of applause that is refreshing to hear and to join in; so different is it from the conventional expressions of approbation, full of sound and fury.

Mdlle. Badia sang with a very fair amount of success; and Mr. Zerbini accompanied intelligently, as well as taking part in the sextet.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The fine concert of last Monday evening was remarkable for the re-appearance of Herr Joachim, the prince of violinists.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Beethoven.
MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.
Serenade, "Awake, awake" ..... Piatti.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Violoncello obbligato—Signor Piatti.
Three Sonatas, for pianoforte alone ..... D. Scarlatti.
Mdlle. Marie Krebs.

PART II.

Chaconne in D minor, for violin alone .... Bach.
Herr Joachim.
Song, "The Garland" ..... Mendelssohn.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Trio in E minor, Op. 119, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Spohr.
Mdlle. Marie Krebs, MM. Joachim and Piatti.

Accompanist . . . Mr. Zerbini.

This season the subscribers have been favoured with the presence of Herr Joachim before as well as after Christmas; nevertheless, his reappearance on Monday night caused the hall to be crammed, and vociferous applause greeted the great Hungarian when he mounted the platform a little after eight o'clock. The second "Rasoumowski" quartet, with its other Russian melody in the third movement, is not exactly a "new thing" to our modern Athenians; nor does M. Joachim's interpretation require a special reporter after so many pleasing experiences. He was thought by the writer and by other connoisseurs to be in splendid form, and to say where he especially excelled would be difficult, if not invidious. In a word, he has never played better. The solo, Bach's Chaconne, with 29 variations, played without accompaniment, has now been heard at the "Popular" 27 times. Herr Becker first introduced it in 1859, and Joachim now interprets the difficult piece in marvellous style. No slight work for either hand with the chords, double stopping, rapid scale passages, arpeggios, chromatic intervals, and other little "lions in the path," but Herr Joachim, like Jack the valiant Cornishman, if, in this case, he did not make the giants, certainly overcomes and, in one sense, kills them. The variations, 9 to 12 inclusive, evoked particular demonstrations from the audience. An encore ensued as of course, and M. Joachim then played Beethoven's rarely-heard "Romance" in G. This (Saturday) afternoon he will lead the third "Rasoumowski" quartet in C, and play the "Kreutzer" sonanta with Miss Krebs. Miss Krebs, now playing alternately with Miss Zimmermann, made a capital choice of Domenico Scarlatti's sonatas, Nos. 7, 8, and 9, in D and A major, from the third books, but the audience were not quite up to the classical music of perennial freshness and beauty. What could exceed, for melody, the second theme (in D minor) of the sonata No. 7; or surpass, for grace and piquancy of rhythm, the one in A, No. 8, with its taking ritornelles? The one No. 9, in D, a presto alla tarantella in 12-8 time, is remarkably racy, full of life and spirit. Mdme. Krebs played in a chaste, scholastic style, suited to the subject; for once, the audience called for no encore.

Spohr's pianoforte trio was first played at the concerts, by the same three gifted artists, in February, 1879. How effective the F natural in the second theme of the first movement (G Major), and the bravura "tributary" that follows. The larghetto, in A, is a lovely air, delicately worked out, and the episode, with digression to C, not to be passed over. In the scherzo might be noted some peculiar modulations, followed up by Schubert in his sonatas. In the finale, so well seasoned by its humoursome treatment of the instruments, an incidental passage reminds one of the pretty Bridesmaids' Chorus in "Der Freischütz," the whole work worth its weight in gold.

Mr. E. Lloyd charmed his audience, but really some check should be administered to the silly people who, as on Monday, persist in their repetition of calls, or "recals," whether with a view to encore, or from a desire to flatter, one is at a loss to say. At least ten minutes must be lost at every concert by those irrational stoppages of business.

A. M.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

It would be as foolish not to look well into the constitution and arrangements of a new musical undertaking as it would for the mariner to neglect the due inspection of the signs of the weather in setting out upon a voyage, although apparently sure of present freedom from storms. The resuscitated Sacred Harmonic Society at their first performance on Friday, Feb. 23rd, gave in many respects an excellent rendering of Gounod's "Redemption." Mr. C. Hallé, as conductor, had evidently taken pains to secure a faithful reproduction of the score, and the organ was in the competent hands of Mr. Fountain Meen. The soloists were Misses M. Davies, Santley, and Hilda Wilson, Messrs. H. Guy, Santley, and Burgon. The chorus containing, it must be assumed, many of the old, tried, and experienced choristers, displayed many of the choral effects so well as to point to the general excellence of the material and its careful training. Mr. H. Leslie's version of the National Anthem preceded the oratorio. The band comprised a goodly number of well known instrumentalists, many of whom were engaged in the production of the work at the Birmingham Festival of last year.

For some time whispered rumours have been afloat with regard to possible changes in the constitution of the orchestra. The banishment of the non-professional strings on the occasion of the first concert has been regarded as the thin end of the wedge; and the new conductor may be expected, perhaps not unnaturally, to surround himself gradually by his own people, and may not improbably decide upon re-forming the entire orchestra in process of time, as his personal power increases. No one doubts the services rendered to the art in different directions by Mr. Chas. Hallé; still thoughtful musicians have, with every desire to gratefully recognize his valued labours to music, been much exercised by his acceptance of the office of conductor to the Sacred Harmonic Society; and the first performance, it must be reluctantly allowed, has to some extent justified the fears of those who doubted the wisdom of the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society in their anything but well advised arrangements in this direction. No man can do justice to such an organization as the Sacred Harmonic Society without the time to develop its large and varied resources, the faculty of securing the complete cohesion of its different interests, and real sympathy with its long and carefully nurtured host of non-professional executants. Certainly the lamentable weakness of the strings, the general want of tone-balance, richness of quality and at times firmness of attack evidenced on the 23rd, must be remedied. Considering the character of the music performed by the Society, its well-trained and long attached body of non-professional strings deserves more consideration than has so far been displayed by the new conductor and committee; and the directors of the Society would do wisely by carefully conserving the results of the past labours of years by developing the non-professional department of their orchestra, by watchfully guarding against needless changes in their staff of well tried professional players, and, in short, by firmly insisting upon the harmonious fusion of the different professional and non-professional elements, which was an original and strong feature of the scheme in days of old, and which secured the adhesion of their most enthusiastic and faithful supporters. It is time indeed again to protest against the appointment of foreign conductors to the direction of thoroughly English societies; unless indeed they have proved themselves to be possessed of not only great leading skill and power, but of real knowledge of our oratorio traditions and well-tried sympathy with the cause of our National art. It cannot be said the gifted pianist to whose care the artistic fortunes of the Sacred Harmonic Society have been committed, has fulfilled satisfactorily such imperative conditions as are above named.

Says another writer: The generally unfavourable impression made upon myself after three attentive hearings of "The Redemption," at the Albert Hall and the Crystal Palace, supported as it is by a studious examination of the score, remains uneffaced by last week's performance of Gounod's oratorio at St. James's Hall at the hands of the resuscitated "Sacred Harmonic Society." An eminent professional musician holds the same opinion as the writer. Technically (it is rather satirically said), successions of major thirds actually appear to have been the sole raison d'etre of many a passage throughout the work. Other equally eligible sources of inspiration (?) may also be detailed.

The truth must be told, sooner or later. It is always wrong and uncharitable to impute motives, but it is believed that a respectable music-selling "interest" has not been altogether "out of the reckoning" in some highly laudatory notices that have appeared in the public press, and are repeated this week. One reporter, evidently a man of the world, kindly cautions the Society that the rush of auditors on February 23, must not be taken as an index to future incursions. The British public go in for "fashion." At the Albert Hall, for example, on Nov. 1, not a seat was vacant, but an ebb of the tide took place between the first performance of "The Redemption" and the second, on Saturday, Dec. 9, and the inundation partly subsided.

It will be seen that Mr. Manns intends to repeat the oratorio at Sydenham (by reason of its alleged success) on an early Wednesday afternoon. As regards the performance at the Sacred Harmonic Concert, it is thought that the readings of Mr. Hallé were not invariably selon les règles; that the band, an imperfectly drilled company, played coarsely but that the chorus is an improvement upon the old society.

MANCHESTER.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Mr. Hallé's last choral concert consisted of a not particularly good performance of "Elijah." Without previous communication with Mr. Hallé, Mrs. Hutchinson took the place of Miss Anna Williams. That the work was too arduous for the former lady to undertake without rehearsal, and at the shortest possible notice, only adds to our appreciation of the kind spirit which actuated Mrs. Hutchinson in coming forward at the last moment. Mdme. Patey was not in very good voice, nor did Mr. M'Guckin seem altogether at home. Mr. Santley, however, was in great form, and his singing of "Is not his word" electrified the audience as much as it ever did in his best days. The choruses were good, but conductor and band were alike wearied out with a long journey from Scotland. The man must indeed be an ardent musician who would choose to play the whole of "Elijah" on an empty stomach.

Last week the miscellaneous programme comprised:—Beethoven's A major Symphony, and the "Moonlight" Sonata, and Weber's Concertstück, the latter grandly played by Mr. Hallé. Miss Elliott was the vocalist. She introduced a charming song from Stanford's new opera, and also sang "O bid your faithful ariel fly" to an accompaniment that was simply disgraceful.

MR. ISIDORE DE LARA'S NEW OPERETTA.

Mr. Isidore De Lara, a favourite baritone vocalist, and a composer of some very effective songs, produced last Saturday night, at Major and Mrs. William Carpenter's elegant house in Astley Place, Victoria Street, an operetta in one act, called "The Royal Word." The libretto, written by Mr. Henry Hersee, one of our most accomplished littérateurs, and worthy of his pen, turns on a (fictitious) incident in the reign of Charles II. The music, scored for a regular band, is bright and sparkling, but of course does not affect profundity; it is essentially a light opera buffa.

The four principal characters were sustained by Mr. De Lara (Charles II.), Miss Wadman (Mrs. St. Vincent St. Jervis), Mr. W. S. Rising, and Mr. Fredk. De Lara. Mr. Albert Visetti conducted the band, and Mr. Walter Scott Hersee was an efficient stage manager. The opera was regularly "mounted," and the singers appeared in proper costume. In the early part of the evening Mr. W. S. Rising (who gave the soirée) sang several times, with success, and solos on the violin and pianoforte were played by Signor Erba and M. Henri Logé.

STATE CONCERT AT DUBLIN CASTLE.

Through the courtesy of Colonel Dease, Chamberlain to the Irish Court, I had the honour of representing your paper at a State Concert in Dublin Castle on the 23rd of Feb., the anniversary of Handel's natal day. The coincidence appears to have been unnoticed by the performers, as the only reminiscence of the famous composer was the fine aria for a bass voice, which was sung by Mr. Grattan Kelly. The vocal solos included two arias, one by Mozart for soprano, the other a pathetic composition from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice." Mrs. Scott Fennell sang the latter; whilst the former, as well as a berceuse of Gounod, were sung by Miss Hanlon remarkably well. The choice of music made by this young lady, may, however, be open to objection, owing to the unusual length of the items she selects, and a studied avoidance of English subjects. Mr. Bapty elected to sing one of a set of six cantatas composed by Dr. Pepusch, when the present century was in its teens, and Mr. J. F. Jones was fairly successful in a song from the pen of the conductor, Signor Caracciolo. The concerted vocal pieces were, a quintet by Bishop, who, on the occasion of his visit to Ireland, circa 1820, received the freedom of the City of Dublin; the madrigal "Who shall win my lady fair?" (Pearsall), a group of Italian "Rime Popolari," arranged for two female voices by Signor Caracciolo, and a quintet from "Cosi fan tutte." Miss Elsner and Herr Elsner performed a sonata for pianoforte and violoncello by Marcello (1686—1739), and the performances of the two vocalists were enhanced by the tasteful violoncello obbligato supplied by Herr Elsner. Signor Esposito was the solo pianist; but I have already noticed his performances of the same compositions on previous occasions. The National Anthem furnished a fitting finale to this very enjoyable performance.

P. J. Conmey.

Leeds.—Dr. Sparks's organ recital on Saturday evening was taken entirely from the works of the late Richard Wagner. The programme included extracts from "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Gotterdämmerung," Niebelungen Ring," "The Flying Dutchman," and the March in F Major from "Rienzi." There was a large attendance, and the programme is to be repeated next Saturday. The idea of devoting one evening to the works of a single composer seems a good one, and from an educational point of view must be specially valuable.

Ealing.—At the Popular Concert on Monday at the Lyric Hall, Hummell's Third Trio for violin, violoncello, and piano, was played by Messrs. P. A. Rooke, Acraman, and H. E. Stidolph, and also Reissiger's Trio in D. Messrs. Stidolph and Rooke also played Handel's Sonata in F, for violin and piano. Madame Frances Brooke was enthusiastically applauded for her songs, "I dreamed a dream," and "Just as well," and Mr. Joseph Lynde also created a very favourable impression by his rendering of "In sheltered vale," and "Simon the Cellarer." Mr. Harold E. Stidolph conducted.

St. James's Smaller Hall.—On Thursday, Feb. 21st., Madame Frances gave her annual ballad concert to a crowded house. She was assisted by some well-known artists, including Miss Minnie Gwynne, Miss Rosa Kissel, Miss Ford-Drake (piano), Mr. Hilton Carter, and Mr. Lovett King, who, besides acting as conductor, contributed two songs; Mr. J. Hilton Carter displayed the possession of a good tenor voice. Madame Frances also gained great applause by her singing. A very favourable reception was accorded to Miss Rosa Kissel (pupil of Mr. Geo. F. Grover), who possesses a fresh soprano voice. The concert altogether was a success, but though ballad concerts are much appreciated, it is a question whether they tend to raise music to its proper level among the people of England.

Oldham.—On Wednesday, the 28th ult., Haydn's "Creation" was performed by Mr. S. R. Platt's choir and orchestra, the principals being Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Jas. Whittaker; conductor, Dr. Marsden.—Mr. Houghton's recitals still continue, Mr. J. Greaves producing fresh programmes weekly, assisted by various local artists as vocalists.—A treat was given to the inmates of the Oldham Union on the 27th inst., in shape of a concert by Mr. J. Greaves and a concert party. The excellent singing of Mr. Lloyd, a local tenor, was highly appreciated, as were also the solos on the violin by Master D. M. Greaves.

Holborn Town Hall.—A concert in aid of the "Central Ear and Throat Hospital," Gray's Inn Road, was held at this hall on the evening of Feb. 21, under the management of the "Holborn Orchestral and Choral Society." The band played Rossini's (now almost effete) overture to "Tancredi," an opera resuscitated at the Royal Italian in 1848, for the sake of Mdlle. Alboni, also movements from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. The choir sang part-songs of Purcell and Sir R. Stewart. Mdlle. Alice Barth won a bis for Bishop's song "Tell me, my heart," and Hudson's "In Arcady." Mr. F. Quatremayne, in good voice, pleased the audience, and eke the conductor, in Handel's air from "Samson," "Honour and arms scorn such a foe"; he was encored in Pinsuti's sensational song "The minute gun." Miss C. Myers and other vocalists sang in turn. A notable number of the scheme was Sir Julius Benedict's pianoforte quartets, arranged from texts of Chopin, and played by himself, Miss L. O'Brien, Mr. F. S. Southgate, and Mr. A. L'Estrange. Sir Julius appeared to be in good spirits, and was evidently well pleased at the success of his work. Mr. F. Sewell Southgate conducted the concert, Mr. J. M. Ennis was accompanist, and Mr. H. Hunter leader of the violins.

Gibraltar Choral Society.—This Society gave an excellent concert at the theatre on the 16th February, to a house crowded from top to bottom. A short miscellaneous first part was composed as follows:—"Montrose's Love Song," sung by Mr. Gartly, Mendelsshon's Rondo Capriccioso for piano, by Master M. Relle, Maud White's "Absent, yet Present," sung by Miss King, Beethoven's Sonata No. 5, for piano and violin, by Miss Ashton and Mr. Llambias, and the favourite "Marta" quartet, "Que vuol dir ciò," sung by Mrs. Galliano, Miss Mosley, Mr. Calamaro and Mr. Gartly. The second part consisted of Sterndale Bennett's cantata, "The May Queen," given with a full orchestra, and the conductor, Signor Ruggero Labocetta, must be considered to have accomplished something little short of a miracle in giving this work complete in every detail. Only those who took part in the performance could know of the apparently insurmountable difficulties which had to be overcome in a place situated as Gibraltar is, and the Society is to be congratulated on the pluck and perseverance which has enabled them to come triumphantly out of the ordeal. The solos in the cantata were taken by Mrs. Relle, soprano, Miss Mosley, alto, Mr. Calamaro, tenor, and Mr. Porral, bass.

Banbury.—On Thursday, Feb. 22, the sacred cantata, by G. F. Root, entitled "Under the Palms," was given in the Exchange Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. S. Hughes. The chorus numbered upwards of 400, and included a large proportion of Sunday School scholars. The soloists were: Miss Julia Jones (London), soprano; Miss Currall (Birmingham), contralto; Mr. Hodgson (Magdalene College, Oxford), tenor; and Mr. Phillips (Magdalene College, Oxford), bass. The work, which is particularly well adapted to a choir of this nature, is descriptive of the Jewish flower feast, and, if not strikingly original, contains some very pleasing numbers. On Thursday, a want of balance in the parts rather marred the effect of the choruses—noticeably one for humming—and, at times, evidence of imperfect training was perceptible, but, as a whole, the performance was satisfactory, and was well received by the very large audience. In the second part, which consisted of "Sacred solos by the Great Masters," Miss Jones sang "I know that my Redeemer liveth" with exquisite sweetness, while Miss Curral was the recipient of quite an ovation for her rendering of "O rest in the Lord." Miss Curral has a clear contralto voice of much power and melody, which, together with her youth, justifies the augury for a very successful future. The general arrangements for the concert left much to be desired.

Wimbledon Musical Society.—This Society gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" on February 21st—a highly creditable rendering, marred only by the evidently unprepared condition of the soprano soloist. Mr. Fredericks, of Hereford Cathedral, however, sang the tenor solo splendidly and won golden opinions for himself. The symphony was well played by the society's efficient orchestra, the trombones and trumpets being particularly good, whilst the violoncellos (eight) told out beautifully in the allegretto ma poco agitato. In the second part of the programme were included Mendelssohn's "Serenade and allegro giojoso," for piano and orchestra, and De Beriot's 9th violin concerto, the solo parts of which were well sustained by Miss Rivenhall and Mr. Crowe respectively, while Miss Emily Dones sang Gounod's "There is a green hill," with orchestral accompaniments, with great pathos—a refined rendering which drew forth an irresistible encore. Later on, Miss Dones was joined in the trio, "Ti prego," which was delightfully sung, by Mr. Fredericks and Miss Whitfield, the latter appearing to be one of the conductor's main supports, playing at the first desk in the orchestra, singing secondary solo parts in the cantata, and playing the pianoforte accompaniments. Mr. Sumner conducted. The hall was crowded. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" will be given on March 8th, with Miss Alice Pany, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Fredericks, and Mr. Orlando Christian as principals.

Music to Shakespeare's "Tempest," by Franz van der Stucken, was lately heard in Antwerp, and favourably criticised.

"Noël," an oratorio by M. Saint-Saens, formed the chief attraction of a recent concert given by the National Society of Music in Paris.

The "Gesangverein" of Posen recently gave a first performance of Blumner's oratorio, "The Fall of Jerusalem" which was well received.

The committee of the Angers Popular Concerts has provided a novelty for the subscribers in the shape of an unpublished symphony by Mendelssohn, written at the early age of 13.

The Dunkerque Society for the Encouragement of Art and Science has opened a series of prize competitions. The prize for music is a gold medal valued at 300 francs, to be awarded to the composer of the best quintet for violin, clarionet, viola, bassoon and double bass.

Signor Terziani's new opera, built upon Massimo d'Azeglio's novel "The Siege of Florence," was produced at the Apollo Theatre, Rome, on the 24th of Feb. An enthusiastic audience encored several movements and called for the author seventeen times, it is said.

It was at the desire of his daughter, Mdme. Cosima Wagner, and in the interests of his health, that Liszt was not present at the funeral of his illustrious son-in-law. The venerable Abbé will remain at Buda-Pesth until Easter, when he will rejoin his daughter and grandchildren at the Villa Wahnfried.

During the Russian Coronation festivities Glinka's "The life for the Czar," followed by "Night and Day," a new Ballet, and Rubinstein's "Demon" will be represented, the Moscow opera troupe being strengthened by performers from St. Petersburgh. A body of 1000 musicians and 8000 school children will render the National Anthem; other musical arrangements are in progress and Rubinstein is writing a coronation march which he will himself conduct.

A profound sensation has been caused in Ancona by the tragic death of an operatic tenor named Ronconi, the son of a baritone celebrated in the days of Lablache, Grisi, and Alboni. He was taking the part of Faust, and when the curtain rose on the first act was seen to be suffering from indisposition, attributed by the manager to nervousness. The curtain was rung down, and the audience entreated to be patient until the tenor had recovered himself. But this was not to be. Poor Ronconi never regained consciousness and died early the next morning, the cause being effusion on the brain, which appeared to have seized him when he was discovered in Faust's arm-chair.

Reviews.

The Redemption, a sacred Trilogy, by Chas. Gounod. (Novello, Ewer and Co.).—Though much has been said of this great work, wherein the story of the revealed scheme of man's salvation is epitomised as it were, it seems fitting that the publication of so notable a contribution to our musical literature shall not pass without some acknowledgment in these pages. At first there was a tendency to compare M. Gounod's oratorio with the great choral works we English people have long been happily familiar with. It was soon realised that such a method of judgment by comparison was not the best way of approaching an oratorio, coming from a nation practically without oratorios, and a work by a man of an undoubtedly large musical individuality. "The Redemption" is one of those poetical works which can only be fairly dealt with by an earnest effort in the direction of appreciation rather than in the way of criticism. The composer tells us that the work was first thought of in 1867, and only completed after much interruption in the course of some twelve years. This simple statement gives evidence of the serious and persistent thought the composer has devoted to his scheme; and we have on record the author's deliberate words, that he elects to regard this oratorio as the chief work of his life. In attempting to speak of the characteristics and merits of this work, it is well to keep clearly in view the character of the composer's genius and musical tendencies. From early predilections and training, M. Gounod's talents were turned towards the direction of sacred art, and his mind became imbued with something of the quaint spirit of plain-song. His genius is of a plastic order, receiving, absorbing, and reproducing impressions, so his music is the refined embodiment of mediæval tune, in an exalted and richly adorned form; and this power assumed historical force when he, with ripened powers, at about the age of 44, produced his setting of the legend of "Faust" in 1859. Now this last exposition of the genius of the leading French composer, is, as it were, a kind of musical miracle-play; the "Christ's Passion" by Gregory Nazianzenus, one of the most ancient of the type, might indeed have furnished M. Gounod with the foundation of his book. It is the dramatic setting in scenes, a sort of mediæval picture of separate incidents on separate panels, of the greatest narrative the world can ever know. The music is full of picturesque, and in its way genuine religious teaching, occasional dramatic touches of rare power, and abundant tune of a quaint, old-world flavour, yet set forward with exquisite modern life and technicalities, including an orchestral colouring of the richest type. Logically and contrapuntally the work is often weak, and in some of its attempted realisations painfully inconsistent — as notably in the "March to Calvary," in which the leading gentle, suffering figure is surely musically absent, and we have little save in the serious tone of the music beyond the pompous tramp of an organized force. The whole scene is as painfully misread as it would indeed have been had it been even depicted as a procession of ecclesiastical pomp and display. It would far better illustrate a march of Knights Templar to a tournament, than it does the touching and wonderful progress—the very thought of which should make "angels fear to tread." Then the melodramatic little scraps by which certain passages of the text are instrumentally announced and ticketed, so to speak, are in some instances not sufficiently sustained to do their work, and consequently, though instinctively, dramatic, are not justified, as lacking sustained dignity and purpose. The scenes named "The Two Thieves" and "The Earthquake" are illustrations of this aptitude for vivid, yet illogical and unconsciously presumptuous, dramatic depiction. But, although no one can presume to compare M. Gounod's "Redemption" as an emanation of genius with Milton's "Paradise Lost," it must be listened to as that great poem must be read—with the desire to appreciate its many charms rather than to criticise its plan and detail. M. Gounod's tender gracefulness finds some effective exemplifications in certain solo sentences and in some of the choral numbers, as in the scenes of "The Holy Women before the Apostles," "The Pentecost," and "The Apostles in Prayer." Though the work has very few manifestations of contrapuntal power of a sustained, strong type, some of the choruses have points and situations of harmonic weight and grandeur, as the last chorus in the work, with its characteristic harmonies, rising step by step to the dominant, to prepare for a brief coda of massive power and dignity. The future of the work will be an interesting chapter in musical history. It may lead to the formation indeed of a school of semi-ecclesiastical, semi-dramatic, and essentially Roman, oratorios, in which modern dramatic power and grace in tune will be flavoured by the quaint spirit of antique plain-song; but it will neither displace the older oratorio types, or possibly even secure in England or Germany that enthusiastic and unchanging admiration which has been conceded to the great sacred works of Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn, to name only three typical composers of oratorio music.

Evening Bells. By Oliver Cramer. (Weekes & Co.).—A pretty and effectively written reverie for pianoforte.

Sonata in A major. By Mozart. (Willey & Co.).—One of the series edited by Lindsay Sloper. The sonata is the well-known one commencing with the beautiful air with variations. It is admirably edited and very clearly printed.

The Moonlight March. By Crosby Smith. (A. Bertini).—A march of not much originality, but yet tuneful.

Yet, song. Words by W. B. Ryall; music by P. E. Van Noorden. (J. B. Cramer & Co.).—Mr. Van Noorden has written a smooth and most agreeable strain in the key of E flat, relieved by a change of rhythm from 4 — 4 to 6 — 8 time. An effective chromatic progression of the bass, at page 3, leads to a climacteric pause on the dominant of the relative (C) minor; and, a few bars further on, the chords of G flat and C flat are introduced. The range is from E flat to E flat, or F natural (the last note optional).

Reeves' Musical Directory for 1883 shows signs of much careful preparation, and is systematically laid out. The list of professors of various instruments includes performers upon sundry inventions which one hardly expects to find likely to engage the serious study of any earnest artists. It might be well to add separate lists of pianists (concert-players), organists, concert conductors and accompanists. However, the Directory is singularly complete, carefully compiled, and answers all its purposes.

Trio, for piano, violin and violoncello. By Rachel Sassoon, Op. 3. (Howard & Co.).—This trio was recently played at Mr. Bonawitz's third chamber concert. The score displays elegant writing and refined scholarship, whilst the work for the three instruments is well "laid out" for effect. The movements are four:—An allegro in E minor; an andante in A major; an allegro vivace (or scherzo) in E major, and a finale in E minor.

The Streamlet (Etude de Salon), for the pianoforte. By Lillie Albrecht. (Duncan Davison & Co.).—A pretty piece in the old "water-course" form. It consists of running arpeggio passages in semiquavers, for both hands alternately—and ends with a rather bold cadence, a progression from the discord of the "extreme sharp sixth" on D flat to the tonic (F major) by contrary motion. The flat ninth (A flat) or the root (G) has been used by Miss Albrecht, and in such a case the resolution is ordinarily on the chord of the 6—4, stigmatised as fade (insipid) by Jean Jacques Rousseau, but useful at the cadence, especially where, as in concertos, a point d'orgue is wanted.

Dr. Stainer's Tutor for the American Organ (Metzler & Co., Great Marlborough Street).—As will be expected, a lucid and artistic book of instruction. The book is entirely devoted to the instrument, and the excellent collection of music given for it. There is one odd repetition to be noted—a little piece by Herold is given twice over in different keys. The Editor includes in his very valuable matter practical examples of the different treatment of chants and tunes, as played in pure vocal harmony, with the melody and bass doubled by turns, and with the leading part treated solo fashion. The exercises for both hands and feet, the hints for registering, and the large, fresh, ample supply of arranged music, are alike excellent from every point of sight.

The Theatre for February leads off with a very interesting article by F. Corder on "Richard Wagner as a Stage Manager." The writer says that his original opinions as to the complexity of Wagner's stage being amateurish were "knocked on the head" by his attendance on July 30th, at the performance of "Parsifal." Mr. F. Corder's account of the stage inventions and effects seems indeed to reveal the composer of "Parsifal" as a man of extraordinary talent for stage effects, and as having remarkable inventive power in suggesting their practical realisation.

RICHARD WAGNER.

(Born, May 22, 1813. Died, February 13, 1883).

In Music-World arch-revolutionist,
Titan-assailant of its elder gods,
For him the menace of the Jovian nods,
The thunders and the rock storm. Yet he kist
With climbing crest the empyrean's crown,
Out-nodding old Olympus in his mood
Of most aggressive mastery. Of the brood
Of Demiurgus militant, whose frown,
Like that of mailéd Mars amidst the boys,
Frightens away Convention's chirrupers,
And to wild cackle as of Goose-flights stirs
Pale Peace's pretty fluters of small joys
And fine factitious sorrows. Then what wonder
He brought the sword into mild Music's sphere,
And in the clangour of the hurtling spear,
The clashing mail, and the loud battle-thunder,
Missed, sometime, of the finer harmony
The still small voice, known of the subtler ear,
Which outlives all War's clarions? Year on year
May pass ere he is measured. Yet we see
The work of a strong shaper, one whose part
Was with new light to show a newer way.
He stripped the gewgaw'd shams of Opera,
Lord of two spheres, he wedded Art with Art,
And Music, sunned in brighter, larger fame,
May date its nobler dawn from WAGNER'S mighty name.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPOSER.

II.

THE matter of approaching the public is indeed one of the most serious undertakings the composer has to encounter. It is not too much to say that the want of respect for art, the feverish desire to anticipate results by rushing before the public only to invite judgment upon premature efforts and other similar ill-advised yearnings for popularity specially rampant in a competitive age, wreck more composers than does even the want of composing skill. The results of a premature advance upon public opinion, are, in the case of almost inevitable failure, of such a serious nature as the adoption of a lower artistic standard by which the young composer may induce himself to believe that he can readily persuade the public which declined to accept a symphony to purchase copies of and use a set of valses or quadrilles. This lowering of the standard, this forgetfulness of the true watch-word of the composer, "Excelsior!" sometimes ends in such a palpable want of self-respect as the adoption of a nom de plume, under which the misguided composer fondly believes he can securely write such music as his higher artistic instincts tell him will place him in danger of the mean, sordid guilt of art-degradation, a crime he well knows not only helps to stay the world's upward progress, but will in no way advance him in his career as the hopeful doer of good work. There are snares for the feet of the anxious young composer, such as the temptation to embark in the hateful royalty system as in vogue in too many concert-rooms. Indeed, the composer and singer alike, who respect art, will diligently avoid the foolish though tempting entanglements of this malpractice, which is degrading to both composer and executant. It may be laid down as a safe axiom by the producing artist in whatever department of art he may practise, that the only lasting success is that which the public sanction by honestly and openly sought for verdicts; and no temporary success built upon the royalty system will prove in the end of any real value. The fact is, the composer, like all other art-producing workers, must learn to regard the getting of money as a secondary matter. Art is a jealous mistress and is apt to revenge herself upon those who think to over-reach the just decrees which time will bring to all who work earnestly and sincerely. This does not imply that the composer may neglect legitimate opportunities and such friendly aid as rarely fail those who respect themselves as servitors of pure art. The pathway of usefulness must not, indeed, be neglected by the composer, for the opportunities he may surely find if he will for the compositions of sueh forms of music as are daily required are not only a legitimate means of gaining reputation, but form a ready school of experience. Such opportunities, however humble apparently, strengthen the composer in his knowledge of his own powers, in his acquaintance with the exigencies of art, and if made good use of surely bring to him a meed of public appreciation. The position of publishers as regards the career of the composer, at present an unsatisfactory one for the most part, must with other aspects of the subject in hand, be discussed another time. E. H. TURPIN.

ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

IV.

ONE great distinction between the presentation of orchestral idioms on the pianoforte and organ arises from the presence on the first named instrument of an exquisite sense of touch which is absent from the organ, and the power of the last named instrument of producing many distinct tone qualities which is not possessed by the pianoforte. The pianoforte tone functions correspond, as has been shown before, with the art of engraving; it possesses many shades, but all of one tinge, and wanting in real colouring power. On the other side, the organ has varied and decided tone colouring properties, with the great wind instrument faculty of sustaining the sounds at the will of the performer; but its disadvantages are found in its fixed wind pressures, which result in hard outlines lacking that nice sense of shading off and tone expression which is secured by the sense of touch in the pianoforte, even though the sounds of the key-board stringed instrument lack the power of producing distinct qualities and the almost equally precious faculty of sustaining given sounds at will. The task of representing orchestral effects on the pianoforte is, therefore, in a large degree dependable upon the special power of the instrument in its readily varied touch, and in a less degree in the transference of as much of orchestral activity as possible to its key-board, as attainable partly through its executive facilities and partly by its comparatively colourless tone quality, which permits rapidity without the mental fatigue attending the excessive activity of tones of a very pronounced quality. On the other hand, the transference of orchestral sentences to the organ key-board must be noted in two nearly opposite directions—in the adroit use of tone qualities as similar as may be to their orchestral prototypes, and in the judicious abridgment of redundant activity, as not only incompatible with fixed and more or less pronounced wind tone qualities, but as being ill-adapted for the more complex mechanisms and somewhat reluctant speaking powers of the organ. ASMODEUS IN THE MUSICAL WORLD.

CHAP. I.

"NAY, thou knowest most ingenious spirit, that the adventures of my ancestor Don Cleofas must be known unto me, wherefore, then, shouldst thou be surprised that I should seek thy help?" "Tell me, then, wherein I might serve thee," said Asmodeus. "Why, spirit," answered Don Pedro Cleofas Escolano Zambullo, the first speaker, "I have joined the brotherhood of harmony, and so would delight to see the members thereof from a point of vantage, to know them as in solitude they write their melodies divine, to see them in their social pleasures"—"Stay," interrupted Asmodeus, "I have no power with these ladies and gentlemen; truly they follow a calling which lifts you mortals away from the influence and spells of the spirits of mischief." "Still," said Don Cleofas, "the musicians of this famous city of Madrid can be but mortal." 'Thou hast, indeed, hit the truth," returned the playful demon; "and I may serve thee, providing only I come not within the reach of the magic of their harmony; and fear not but that even those mortals who serve the cause of harmony, although for the most part innocent enough, have their little foibles, the contemplation of which may afford thee some little instruction, and possibly some amusement." "Agreed, then," cried Don Zambullo, I will, with thine aid, O friendly demon, penetrate some of the secrets of the world of song." "Thine ancestor only *—— generations back sought not the company of musicians; however, every one to his taste, and as thou hast sought me out, and after the manner of thine ancestor released me from the baleful influence of the malignant magician, I will not be ungrateful. Come, then, as I said to thine ancestor, my whilom friend, let us make the best of our way; take hold of the end of my cloak and fear not; in our flight I will show you some of the doings of the musical world, on a vastly different scale to such a family concert as afforded amusement to your somewhat cynical and worldly-minded, though at the bottom of his heart really worthy ancestor, in which a spinet, an oboe, and a couple of ill-assorted singers took part." Conversation now ceased, for Asmodeus found his skill in avoiding observation during a daylight journey severely taxed, and the aspiring, curious musical student was too giddy in his novel aerial flight to be inclined to talk, or even to listen. Asmodeus by his magic power permitted the student to see several notable musicians in their own homes. "But," said Don Cleofas, "I hear no music." "No," cried Asmodeus, "your celebrated musicians are rarely able quietly to enjoy the art they serve so well; albeit, even when their professional labours are over, the burden of the art's development presses sorely upon them in the way of attendance at their committee meetings and in the slavery of an endless correspondence." [This strange passage almost awakens a suspicion as to the really modern character of open discussions and postal facilities.] "However," continued the friendly demon, "thou shalt know more of some of these gentlemen by-and-bye; let us now hasten to a notable spot where your divine art is being expounded upon an imposing scale." "Señor Asmodeus," presently cried the noble young student, "we are leaving Madrid behind us, and are rapidly approaching the Palacio del Vidrio, and I know that thou wouldst enable me to learn something of the great festival of the mighty German, Wandel, whose noble strains are to be drawn forth by the potent and self-confident Don Comercio. Methinks even now that I hear a murmuring sound, as of voices engaged in a not inharmonious struggle with tones which strike me as those of a military band, from the strange preponderance of such noisy instruments as are in more musical countries deemed to be best reserved for secular purposes and out-door pleasures." [It would not appear that any investigation of the archives of Madrid has revealed documentary evidence as to the existence there of a great naturalised composer, any trace of the conducting art, the presence of an able and autocratic conductor, the accompanying incense of conductor worship, and of any aptitude for musical festivals; still the above statement certainly appears in the MS. from which this narrative is printed, and it may again be pointed out that history repeats itself; the reader must draw his own conclusions.] "Surely, friend Asmodeus," said Don Zambullo, when these worthy and strange companions had fairly perched themselves in the highest available resting place of the vast Palacio del Vidrio, "the sounds I hear cannot be the unadulterated, sweet, noble choral strains of the great Wandel!" "No, truly, Don Cleofas," returned Asmodeus, "but dost thou not know that the potent Don Comercio is the chief propounder of the new doctrine which tells that success secured by comparatively easy means is the first duty of the leader, that to this end the music must be made to go, and that it is ever more important to secure by the strong rhythmical assertive pomp of trumpets and drums, &c., credit for the leader, than it is necessary to respect the historical intentions and judgment of the composer? And so your fine leader scruples not to alter, add to, and overload, in order that the world may admire without stint the potency of his magic wand." More of this notable conversation must be reserved for another chapter, when the reader may, if he likes, resume his perusal of this delectable narrative.

* The exact date of the MS. from which this narrative is printed it is not thought necessary to reveal; neither is it deemed advisable to announce the date of the adventures here detailed; the ingenious reader may guess if he likes with regard to the date thereof, and should he be perplexed by the likeness of the incidents to similar adventures he has heard of elsewhere, he may, if he should choose to do so, console himself with the thought that "history repeats itself."

AN UNIQUE MS. COLLECTION OF ANCIENT CHURCH MUSIC.

The following extracts are from a most interesting article by R. C. Hope, in the Antiquarian Magazine:—

There is in the Library of that most ancient College of Peterhouse, at Cambridge—once the University—an unique collection of music of the fullest kind as yet discovered, illustrating the Choral Service of the Church of England during the period immediately preceding the Great Rebellion, and composed of Services and Anthems.

The collection consists of two incomplete sets of part-books. The first set comprises four small folio volumes, viz., part books of the Medius, and Bassus Cantoris, Contra-Tenor, and Bassus Decani.

The second set is far more complete than its compeer, consisting of seven volumes the same size as the first, and in the same kind of binding, viz., Medius, Tenor, and Bass Cantoris, Medius, Contra-Tenor, Tenor, and Bassus Decani.

Neither the handwriting nor the musical notation is of later date than the period immediately preceding the Great Rebellion; on the other hand, some of the pieces are coeval with the Reformation. The indexes, though very systematic, are both defective and incorrect. Some of the compositions are by most distinguished men, almost unknown, and some of them have not been discovered anywhere else. The Rev. Mr. Jebb, in his index, says, after a very careful examination, he thinks "the collection was at least completed and put into shape while Dr. Cosin, the celebrated Bishop of Durham, was Master of Peterhouse, for the following reasons:—

(1) An English Litany, set to music by Molle, and a Latin Te Deum, by Dr. Child, were composed at Dr. Cosin's request, as appears by the notice prefixed.

(2) Accompanying the part-books is a fine copy of the black-letter folio Prayer-book, printed by Barker, of the date 1634, the very year when Dr. Cosin entered upon his Mastership. This volume is interleaved with music-paper, in the places required by the usages of the fullest choral method, and it contains selections from the compositions in the part-books, and one of the above-mentioned notices of Dr. Cosin's request.

(3) The compositions in those volumes include contributions, not only of the principal musicians then at Cambridge and Ely (as Loosmoor, Ramsay, Molle, and Amnor), but of those connected with the Cathedrals, of which Dr. Cosin was a member, namely, Durham and Peterborough.

It is probable that a choral service had been used by the society before and after the Reformation, in the aisle of the neighbouring church of Little St. Mary's, which served for their chapel till 1632, and that some of the Latin documents, of ante-Reformation date, belonged to their choir, especially the four part-books of Latin services still preserved at Peterhouse; but whether the choir was kept up after the Reformation or not, at all events it would seem at least to have been reinforced on the building of the chapel in 1632, under the auspices of Dr. Wren, and that he and Bishop Cosin collected materials for the service from the contemporary composers at Cambridge and elsewhere.

The black-letter folio Prayer Book has the Preces set by various composers; the celebrated service of Gibbons in F throughout, including the Venite, set as a canticle, as was customary in the older services, several sets of responses, three Litanies, several Kyries, the Nicene by Gibbons, a Sanctus with the preceding versicles, probably by Amner, and a "Gloria in Excelsis" by Amner. It is to be remarked that there is a blank music leaf inserted at the offertory, which it was probably intended to fill up, as we find that an offertory sentence was sometimes set to music in old times. At the end of this volume is a Latin translation of the Morning and Evening Service (but not of the Litany, Communion Service, or Psalter), interleaved with music-paper. From this it may be inferred that the Latin service was occasionally used at Peterhouse, as it still is at Christ Church in Oxford. There are also two Latin musical Litanies by Loosemoor and Molle; the latter is expressly designated "Pro Coll. Sti. Petri." The version used for these Litanies differs both from that employed at Oxford, and from that recited at the meetings of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. As far as Mr. Jebb is aware, nothing of this particular version has been discovered, beyond what is preserved in these musical adaptations of the suffrages. The translation of the matins and evensong also differs, it is believed, from any now extant.

The few Latin services in the part-books consist of the Te Deum, the Jubilate, and in one instance only of the Kyrie and Creed. There are no evening services so adapted; from which it may be inferred that the Latin form was used occasionally only. The same remark is applicable to at least one of these, which was made with respect to the black-letter Prayer Book.

As to the English services, those for the evening are more numerous than for the morning. Either the choral service was then, as now at Trinity College, confined to surplice times, which are nearly twice as frequent in the evening as in the morning; or the matins on week-days were more simply performed than in the evening.

The Latin Te Deum, by Dr. Child, was composed, "for the Right Worshipful Dr. Cosin." If this designation points to his Vice-Chancellorship, the date is 1639. It may possibly have been intended for some solemn occasion at St. Mary's. It may be observed that as there are in the collection Latin Litanies, by Loosemoor and Ramsay, organists of King's and Trinity, and by Molle, who seems to have been connected with Peterhouse. These Litanies were probably used on certain occasions in the above-named colleges; and if so, it may be reasonably inferred that the Litanies used before the University were not less solemnly performed, but were sung in Latin, as is still the usage of Oxford towards the beginning of each term.

In some instance occurs a very singular kind of musical writing, the notes being of a rhomboidal form, very bold and distinct, often accompanied by Gothic or old-English letter. The notation of the black-letter Prayer Book is from the same hand, but the words are written cursively

In the original indexes the compositions are methodically distributed under distinct heads, thus :—

1. "Ad Domine labia," i.e., the preces or versicles before the Psalms.

2. "Psalmi Festivales," or the psalms arranged like canticles, such as we find in many of the older services used on great festivals—a feature of the Church service now obsolete.

3. The Venite Exultemus, arranged as a canticle.

4. "Ad Dominus vobiscum," or the responses after the Creed.

5. "Litanies," English and Latin.

6. "Full Services," under the three heads of "Ad Matutines," "Ad officium Altaris" (consisting of Kyrie and Creed, including also, in a few instances, the Gloria before the Gospel and an offertory sentence), and of "Ad Vespertinas."

7. "Verse services," with the same three-fold division.

8. "Full Anthems," in the divisions "of praise," "of prayer," "of penitence."

9. "Verse anthems," similarly classed.

10. "Ad sursum corda" and "Ad Gloria in Excelsis." There are, however, no settings of the Sursum Corda, except the black-letter Prayer Book, and but few of the Sanctus and Gloria in Excelsis.

11. "Antiphonæ Festivales," being, for the most part, the proper collects of the great festivals.

The same designations, as far as they are applicable, are observed in the black-letter Prayer Book. This distribution confirms the fact, of which, however, there is ample evidence besides, that the distinction between full and verse services and anthems has existed at least since the Reformation.

REMOVAL OF THE CHURCH SCREEN.

Under the above title appears an article in the Musical World, signed "Pencerdd Gwffyn," and the following paragraph from it deserves special attention :—

The removal of the Cathedral screen is a sign that the age of exclusiveness is passing away; a sign that the service and anthem of former days, written and performed for the delectation and edification of a few, are doomed to give place to something better adapted to the widened area, with its thousands of occupants. The leaders and followers of what is called the "Catholic revival" of the present generation are making demands upon the musician as well as builder and decorator; they call for music to aid in securing the attention and interest of the people. And it must be acknowledged that our young church composers are responding with great alacrity, and some ability. Never before has there been so much written and published, and never before has music reached the multitude with such force. The sacred compositions now teeming from the press show above all things yearnings and strivings for effect. The style of the last century is discarded for what is thought more earnest and stirring. Artifices, deemed once upon a time essential to writings with any pretence to learning, are passed by in the hurry of producing themes with a grip strong enough to hold the unwilling and agitate the listless. This anxious wish for vigour is now a characteristic of the greater portion of the Church, where, happily, however, it can find expression without travestying either religion or music. Nevertheless, the younger musician is often found resorting to modes not altogether free from violence. An undue force in the musical illustration of Scriptural text, and an extreme form of emphasis and accent on certain solemn words, are errors regretted by those not inclined to overlook impropriety because zeal is the prompter. This excess is particularly noticeable in passages embodying the mysteries of our holy religion—themes of such an awful import as to bow the discomfited mind of man to the earth—in dealing with these unfathomable subjects the modern composer presumptuously tries to represent, as it were, the miracle which first accompanied and substantiated the spiritual verities. Thus, for instance, in the recital of the passion of our Lord, the musician is sometimes found labouring, by abrupt transitions, or unnatural harmonic combinations, to supply by his art the place of supernatural confirmation. Far better and wiser would it be for him to pass by such impenetrable mysteries with the modesty and self-abnegation of predecessors. Besides, does not the special effect of to-day become the discarded clap-trap of to-morrow? The Church composer has assuredly a field before him wide enough for the exercise of the greatest genius or the vastest ambition—for, has he not the heart of man with all its emotional attributes open to his touch? By his art, which is well called "divine," he has free entrance into, and potent sway over, that too often closely-guarded realm. At his bidding, the gentler passions troop out from their hiding-places, whilst pity and love are drawn wheresoever he wills.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

On Saturday last Mr. Alfred Carder was the organist. His opening solos were a selection from Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and a Toccata in F from Widor's second set of organ symphonies, in which the player was not at all points at his best. Lux's "O Sanctissima" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" March (by desire) formed the next and popular group. Mr. Carder's selection from Gounod's "Redemption" was seriously marred by an unfortunate cyphering. A pleasing selection from "Don Giovanni" received a skilful and effective rendering, and was duly appreciated. A "Festival March," by Horner, completed the organ solos. Mdlle. Eugene Bernard proved herself to be an accomplished pianist, playing Chopin's "Ballade" in G minor, and Listz's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" with much finish and skill. The vocalist, Mr. James Sauvage, has an excellent voice, and is an artist. His rendering of Purcell's "Mad Tom" secured an encore. By-the-way, the date given on the programme, 1650, was some 40 years too early; Purcell was born in 1658. Mr. Sauvage's other songs greatly pleased the audience. Mr. Fountain Meen was the able accompanist. On March 10th, Mr. James Higgs, the esteemed Hon. Sec. of the Musical Association, will be the organist; Mr. T. T. Trimnell, of Sheffield, plays on March 17th, and Mr. W. de M. Sergison, on March 24th; Prof. Macfarren and the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music have kindly consented to the appearance here of the Royal Academy of Music Operatic Class, on March 12th, under the direction of Messrs. Gustave Garcia and Fiori.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Prof. G. A. Macfarren gave the second of his course of four lectures on Bach's "Twenty-four Preludes and Fugues," on Tuesday last, the course being completed on March 6th and 13th, at the Holborn Town Hall. Mr. Windyer Clarke was again the able illustrator of the Professor's learned and deeply interesting analysis of Bach's great work. The inspection was proceeded with in detail up to the Prelude and Fugue in F Minor, terminating the first half of the work. In his opening observations Prof. Macfarren spoke of the early English editions of Preludes and Fugues, saying there seemed to be some evidence to show that that one issue anticipated by a year or so the first German print; the Professor also alluded to the Preston, Wesley and Horn editions, the last by the combined editors being marked by much care and judgment. In the course of Prof. Macfarren's masterly analysis, he pointed out with remarkable acumen several substantial indications of modern form, as in the Prelude in E flat, 9-8 time, as a model of the "Songs without words," and the pathetic prelude in F minor, in 2-4 measure, as a distinct epitome of the dual allegro form. The lecturer's most interesting and very valuable observations were closely followed by a large audience, many having copies of the work, reference being facilitated by the number of bar in each case being announced. Mr. Windyer Clarke played the illustrations with much clearness, charm, and character. Mr. James Higgs efficiently acted as chairman, and duly reminded those present of the dates (March 6th and 13th) of the two remaining lectures.

Correspondence.

THE CHRIST CHURCH ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Permit me to state that the date given in my letter last week referred, not to the organ, but to Dr. Gauntlett's performance thereon. It may, perhaps, interest some of your readers if I add, that attached to the case of the instrument are six brass plates, one of which, I am told, records the introduction of a double dulciana and another stop, the gift of a former rector of the parish. Over the manuals there is an embellishment presented by a gentleman who contributed largely to the reconstruction of the organ in the year 1839.

Yours truly,
Feb. 26. C. H. K. F.

WAGNER AND GOUNOD.

However it may fare with politics and business, music is in perpetual session. London is being constantly flooded with music. At the end of the season, it simply adjourns in a mass into the provinces. From external and public appearances, it might be argued that there is no great difference between the musical past and present. Formerly, the metropolis had its operas and concerts from Easter to August. As good music was performed for the delight of the subjects of George III. as for the pleasure of the subjects of Queen Victoria. To read the diary of Thomas Moore, it would be thought the English public two thirds of a century ago was as musically enlightened as in these days. When society migrated into the country, Birmingham and the three cathedrals held their musical celebrations as now. These were as enthusiastically and almost as numerously attended. The difference is that music, until within a very brief period, was a monopoly. There was a musical public thoroughly and learnedly instructed. Outside were black pitch, ignorance, and insensibility. Dinners and balls were needed to allure popular audiences in the shires. In London, the public did not pretend to understand or sympathize. A crowded house to listen to the compositions of Herr Wagner now implies an enormous multitude as curious and as intelligent waiting for its turn and share afterward. The thousands who hung absorbed upon M. Gounod's setting of the mysteries of Christianity represented a hundred-fold the numbers which have been training themselves by musical habituation and practice to appreciate its merits. Impostors may be detected in abundance, as at all times, and in reference to all subjects, who repeat commonplaces of musical criticism, while perceiving much less of their meaning than the Cambridge pretenders to familiarity with thermo-dynamics denounced by Mr. G. H. Darwin. Enthusiasm for music is often affected, when none is felt. At present, the hypocrisy is at all events the homage rendered by the few to the musical taste of the many rather than the reverse. It is a mere accident of place and opportunity where music plants its standard and summons its votaries.

M. Gounod and Herr Wagner have very little in common. Both, however, agree in expecting from music at once more and less than their great predecessors demanded. Music was disembodied formerly. Bach, Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven might be inspired by occurrences outside them: their lofty creations were reared on no others foundation than the builder's sense of harmony and melody; he obeyed and expressed his own mood; the material words and plot to which he happened to attach it were the merest afterthought. The music of the present, as of the future, whether it be dramatic or epic, aims at commenting upon themes formally, and deliberately compelling or praying its assistance to illustrate them. It has consented to be a servant, that it may help to guide and govern where before it claimed to be independent, abiding by its own laws, and flowering in accordance with none beside them. The disciple of Herr Wagner as to see and read as well as hear. Hearers of M. Gounod are invited to come with minds attuned to particular emotions and ideas to which "The Redemption" will give a brighter meaning, a more gracious significance. Herr Wagner bids the world listen, and learn to think and feel as he acts the minstrel before it. M. Gounod asks his admirers to bring hearts and minds charged with pious awe, and he will surround them with the atmosphere in which they can most fitly breathe. Herr Wagner requires a a surrender. M. Gounod desires to co-operate and accompany. Each exacts an attendance of thoughts and feelings beyond those in which music was content once to lap itself. Music has been brought down from the realm in which it dwelt apart to be the companion and minister of the dramatist and poet. It is to be hoped that what it loses by ceasing to be its own sole interpreter other fields of art may gain in which it agrees to serve as interpreter for them. But that for itself there is some diminution in freedom and spontaneity it would be difficult to deny.—Musical Herald.

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

A contributor writes:—

Mr. Southgate's report of the first Philharmonic concert, on February 15th, was doubtless exhaustive and strictly just. A difference of opinion appears to exist amongst critics respecting the efficiency of the band. One gentleman pronounces the orchestral performance to be perfection, and the exacting writer in the Times has no qualifying expression of disapproval to alloy his general tone of laudation. Mr. Cusins may be credited with all skill and savoir faire as a conductor, and his industry I know to be untiring, but the band have not the advantage of frequent rehearsals or constant co-operations. The "Ruins of Athens" music was welcome. Lo! and behold, how a great master could write in unison for voices, as testifieth that "Chorus of Dervishes" in E minor! An old Philharmonic, I must admit, and I rejoice to admit, that the performance of the prelude to "Parsifal" was excellent; it had been evidently studied severely. The prelude itself I do not profess to fathom at present, and naturally avoid adverse criticism (even if called for), at this mournful time. The themes may be difficult to understand; the scoring, especially in the latter part of the piece, is recognised by musicians as transcendently grand.

Certainly the orchestra of the Philharmonic, according to another pen, stands in the sunlight of a great artistic and historical position, and must expect the cobwebs and dust to be seen and protested against by the critical world. For years the occasional want of light and shade, and now and then of general finish—notwithstanding the many excellences of its material and generally fine tone—have been topics of observation. The directors cannot do more wisely than solicit anxious and well-timed criticism. And it will be well for the critics to exercise their power with all care and judgment; remembering that there are no perfect orchestras anywhere, and that all existing in this and in other countries are capable of being vastly improved; avoiding foolish conductor-worship, an idiotic craze rather rampant at times; and bearing in mind that partisanship and prejudice, so easily overbalanced, are features of, often real, musical enthusiasm, which are commonly fatal to the best interests of the art.

STRATFORD.—The opening concert of the Upton Choral Society was given in the Stratford Town Hall on Monday evening the hall being well filled, and those who were present had good reason to congratulate themselves on not having missed so good a performance. The first piece on the programme was Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, which was very effectively rendered throughout, the solos being taken by Miss F. A. Jones, who was well supported in the choruses by a well-trained choir of ladies and gentlemen. The concluding chorus was very spiritedly given in excellent time, and called forth much applause. The second and third parts of the programme comprised an admirable selection of songs and part-songs, in all which the vocalists showed exceptional ability; the prominent among these were Miss Brough and Mr. Atherton Latta, who were both very warmly encored. Mr. F. C. Kitson, who presided at the pianoforte, also took part in a duet with Mr. G. B. Gilbert with signal success.

SOUTH LONDON INSTITUTE OF MUSIC.—The fifth annual concert of the season by the Camberwell Choral Association took place on Tuesday last, when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," and the wedding music from Handel's "Joseph," formed the chief item in the programme. Miss Mawhinny, Miss Myers, Mr. A. Thompson, and Mr. A. Moore were the soloists, the orchestral band of the Institute supplied the accompaniments, and Mr. L. Venables conducted with his accustomed care and skill. The chorus, though very short of tenors, did its work well, especially in "Immortal pleasures" and "O Lord, we trust alone in Thee," from "Joseph," but the band was somewhat out of tune, and in the accompaniments to the soli portions was considerably louder than was needful. Mr. Moore's capital singing of the difficult bass air in "Joseph," earned an enthusiastic recal. In the second part of the programme, the principal features were the violin solo of Mr. Gatehouse and the artistic singing of Sullivan's "Distant shore," by Mr. Thomson. The ladies also contributed vocal solos, but the effect in one instance was marred by an indifferently played violin obbligato—not by Mr. Gatehouse. Part-songs were given by the choir, and the band was heard in a gavotte by W. S. Lambert, which was chiefly noticeable as beginning on the first beat of the bar instead of the third, as, in my opinion it should do. The hall was well filled by an appreciative audience.

Passing Events.

Mr. Russell Lochner announces a benefit concert at the Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, on March 12th.

The Brousil family resumed their serial concerts of chamber music on Thursday afternoon, March 1, at their house in Harrow Road.

Herr Friedmann, a baritone de la premiere force, will give a grand concert in May, at Kensington, under the immediate patronage of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh.

Mr. W. H. Jude, of Liverpool, contributes to Hand and Heart for March, a spirited temperance chorus having a vigorous theme, and, in good contrast, a tranquil episodical sentence.

Mr. W. A. Barrett gave his lecture on Balfe at the London Institution on March 1st. The same lecturer will address the members of the College of Organists on April 3rd.

On March 7th, at the Rooms of the Society of Arts, a lecture will be given on "The History of the Pianoforte," by Mr. A. J. Hipkins. John Stainer, M.A., Mus.Doc., will preside.

The Sherborne School Musical Society give their 71st concert on Easter Monday, March 26th, the 56th anniversary of the death of Beethoven (1827). The programme will include, Symphony in C major, Op. 21 (Beethoven); "The Messiah" (Handel); and Siegfried Idyll (Wagner). Conductor, Mr. Louis N. Parker.

Mdme. Sophie Menter gave a pianoforte recital on Feb. 20th, at the Assembly Rooms, Bath. For one hour and three quarters, without the aid of notes, and with very little rest, she took her audience through a programme which contained selections from the works of J. S. Bach, Beethoven, D. Scarlatti, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Chopin, and Rubinstein, passing from one to the other with perfect ease.

A valuable collection of musical instruments, comprising pianofortes by Erard, Broadwood, and other well-known makers, three curious old clavichords, violins, violoncellos, and double basses, wind instruments, etc., also a library of valuable musical works, including a curious collection of early printed music for the harpsichord and clavecin, some scarce manuscripts of Scarlatti, Jomelli, Pergolesi, Handel, Purcell, etc., instrumental and vocal works, etc., were recently sold by auction by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson.

Prof. G. A. Macfarren completed his 70th year on Friday, March 2nd. That the esteemed Cambridge Professor and Principal of the R.A.M. will long continue to enjoy the admiration and profound respect of the musical world will be the earnest wish not only of those who are privileged to know him personally, but also of all who are interested in the cause of English art, and gratefully remember the very remarkable services rendered thereto by the greatly honoured bearer of the name of G. A. Macfarren.

In pursuance of the political craze of all parties—the bidding too exclusively for the support of the humbler classes, the Standard puts forth an insane proposal for taxing the owners of pianofortes £5 per annum on each instrument, the effect of such proposal being the imposition of increased burdens upon our middle classes, to the immunity of the extreme classes, for the rich would not feel such an imposition. To thus check the growth of the refining cultivation of music, to practically deprive thousands of homes of their most valued comfort, would be a policy as idiotic and as cruel as the reinstating of such condemned taxes upon life, health, and progress, as the window and paper taxes. Surely the income tax falls heavily enough already upon our middle classes, without further special burdens in the same direction. Figaro says upon the new proposal:—"The lower classes would not feel the tax because they would not pay it. The upper classes would pay the tax, but they would not feel it. It is time, not that the middle classes should be further taxed, but that they should have some relief from taxation. Nothing could, therefore, be more monstrously unjust than to levy a new tax the burden of which would fall almost exclusively upon their shoulders. He who pleads for a tax of five pounds a year on the musical instrument which in these days adorns the most modest drawing-room, has few sympathisers."

The Committee of the Organ Builders' Benevolent Institution announce that a ticket benefit will take place in aid of its funds, from Monday, March 5th, to Friday, March 9th, when will be acted the "Silver King." The secretary is Mr. W. Farmer, 4, Queen Street, Camden Town.

Mr. Emil Behnke gave a valuable and interesting lecture before the Society of Arts on the 22nd, on "The Human Voice as a Musical Instrument, its Mechanism and Management." Mr. Lennox Browne, a distinguished authority in throat and vocal surgery, was in the chair. It is interesting to know that Mr. Emil Behnke has succeeded in obtaining some good photographs of his own vocal cords and soft palate in the act of tone production. For 28 years this result has been tried for in different countries, but until now without success.

L. VAN BEETHOVEN'S LATER SONATAS.

A Lecture delivered in the London Institution on March 22, 1883.

BY HERR ERNST PAUER.

Principal Professor of the Pianoforte at the Royal College of Music, Professor of the Pianoforte at the Guildhall School of Music, the School of Art and Science, Crystal Palace, &c., &c.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—The subject of our lecture this evening is, "The Later Sonatas of Beethoven." You will recollect that on the last occasion we discussed the nature and character of Beethoven's earlier sonatas; I had also an opportunity of observing that his sonatas show an enormous progress compared with those of Haydn, Clementi, and Mozart, and that he was able to produce effects in them of which Haydn and Mozart scarcely ever dreamed. In some respects the later sonatas of Beethoven differ from his earlier works in that form. We shall find that in later years when a sad and dire calamity—deafness—had overtaken him, our great master deviated occasionally from the plain and beaten path of order, a path along which he had travelled through hard struggles and incessant toil; he himself began to think somewhat lighter of the laws of order and rule, which he had followed with wonderful faithfulness, and he, the triumphant representative of classicism in all its best and most powerful phases, became towards the end of his life slightly diffuse and less thoroughly satisfactory, somewhat cloudy, and at times even unintelligible.

Beethoven's later life became more and more solitary. He was difficult of access; his deafness made him mistrustful. He would not listen to the advice of his friends; any suggestion they good-naturedly made, was received with mistrust, and yet the man himself was thoroughly good and noble, and his soul as pure as that of a child. Beethoven was a man of intense feeling, he was moved by violent, strong passions, which influenced him the more, as owing to his deafness he was condemned to a solitary life, and was unable to impart his moral sufferings to other people. If we only make due allowance for all the eccentricities, the oddities of his character, that resulted from his deafness, we find in him a powerful nature, equally strong in love and in hate. The innermost essence of Beethoven's nature was a deep longing for love and completeness, as we find it so touchingly expressed in his letters. His innermost power exhibits itself also in a strong self-consciousness, and in a certain pride. Beethoven expresses in his works a high truly Germanic idealism. He held his art as high as possible. Music was for him "a higher revelation than wisdom and philosophy." His iron will and wonderful perseverance showed itself not only on himself, but also in his works. He did not possess that spontaneity and electric rapidity of producing that distinguished Mozart; Beethoven had to dive deeper; he required the contact with other intellects; for this reason we find that Beethoven's music is neither a mere sensuous enjoyment, only depending on the beauty of its sound, nor a symbolical, moralising, or poetically playful one—it is real ethical art, originating in the desire to reveal the Highest and the most Sacred, aiming at "touching the depth of man's heart," "lifting him up to a better and purer sphere from the petty troubles of this nether world." Beethoven's music does not touch us merely superficially—it moves and excites and pacifies our feelings; it makes us tremble by the might of its contrasts, and again it pacifies and tranquilises us by its iron logic and by the solemn earnestness through which these contrasts are solved.

These introductory remarks, Ladies and Gentlemen, were necessary in order to prepare the ground of our present discussion. It is indispensable to know the reason why there is such a vast difference between the earlier and later sonatas of Beethoven, and this reason is really and truly the effect of his unfortunate malady—deafness—upon his whole nature and feeling. No words could better apply to Beethoven's case than Schiller's lines in "Wallenstein"; this last period of Beethoven's life presents a sad contrast with—

> These first years,
> When he was making progress with great effort,
> But since that ill-starr'd day
> A gloomy, darkened and distrustful spirit,
> Unsteady and suspicious, has possess'd him.
> His quiet mind forsook him, and no longer
> Did he yield up himself in joy and faith
> To his old luck and individual power.

Much has been said about the illustrious master's aberrations, about the indistinctness and the absence of harmony and unity of his last works, when compared with those of his former years; but, after all, if we closely examine the features which have been planned in these last works, we shall find that they are merely exaggerations of eminent qualities. The beauties are still there, the marks of genius in their highest potency, but the just proportion is wanting, that assigned to each charm its appropriate place and measure—and the very fulness and exuberance of the various qualities produces a sense of disturbance. No composer has ever written finer melodies than Beethoven has produced over and over again; but whilst the nature of music demands that a melody should be surrounded, supplemented, and completed by harmony—which harmony consists of tones that have a secondary importance only, we find in Beethoven's last works so great a desire to sing in his parts that each of them actually becomes a melody in itself, and thus destroys, or at least interferes with, the indispensable balance of power. These faults are faults arising neither from ignorance, nor from negligence; they are the idiosyncrasies and peculiarities which may never be wholly disassociated from the human intelligence, when it soars away on the track of ideal enthusiasm. "The giants must live alone." They are above ordinary mortals and ordinary rules. They may be condemned before the tribunal of criticism for incorrectness or for a forbidden license; many a passage, which revealed itself to the composer's spirit during the highest flight, appeared to him combined in a unity far above the conditions of daily rule or common perception.

Now we come to the illustrations, chosen to exhibit in a practical manner the correctness of the just mentioned remarks. I have selected three sonatas, all belonging to the later period of Beethoven's life, namely the (commonly called) Characteristic Sonata: "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour," No. 26, Op. 81; the Sonata No. 30, Op. 109, in E major, and the last of Beethoven's Sonatas, No. 32, Op. 111, in C minor. I propose to read some analytical remarks before performing these works; and thus I shall have an opportunity to elucidate several points not touched upon in the introductory remarks.

With regard to the sonata "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour," I may mention that for a long time the public was under the impression that this work was the result of a poetic and affectionate feeling, and that its strains described the composer's state of mind and heart at the parting, the absence, and the return of a beloved member of the fair sex. But the sober truth soon came out, and the fact was revealed that the mysterious object of Beethoven's musical poetry was not a graceful lady, but his Imperial Highness the Archduke Rudolph, Cardinal Archbishop of Ollmütz, and pupil of Beethoven. It is well known that Beethoven had an antipathy to giving lessons; and although his Imperial Highness did everything in his power to gild the pill, although he gave the strictest orders to the members of his household to dispense in Beethoven's case with all the customary rules of etiquette, to admit him at once to his presence, indeed to treat him with the greatest possible respect and deference, Beethoven, in spite of all these favours, felt uncomfortable when giving lessons, and even went so far as to declare that "after having given one lesson he felt ill for two days." It is almost comic to read the eighty-three letters which Beethoven wrote to his Imperial Highness, and which consist (with few exceptions) of nothing but excuses for "not coming" or "not having come to give a lesson." The wonderful patience of the Imperial pupil was never exhausted by this rather capricious and whimsical behaviour of his master; he received the touchy composer at all times with unvarying kindness and urbanity, and showed his sincere respect and ardent admiration for the illustrious master on every possible occasion. It may be that Beethoven, conscience-stricken as he was at times at the consciousness of his neglect of his duties as a teacher, tried with this sonata to soften the anger—if such a feeling ever existed—of his Imperial pupil; at least, on the title page of the autograph copy is the inscription: "The farewell at the departure of his Imperial Highness the Archduke Rudolph, on the 4th of May, 1809." And the first page of the last movement shows the inscription: "The arrival of his Imperial Highness the Archduke Rudolph, 30th January, 1810." The wonderfully sincere and earnest expression of the whole sonata does not admit of the idea that Beethoven meant the work to be a joke; we must, therefore, accept it as a work planned and finished with the same care that Beethoven devoted to all his compositions. The parting and the absence are depicted with the greatest accuracy in melancholy, deeply moving, but never sentimental, tones; we may almost fancy we see the movement of the hand that waves the last farewell to a departing beloved one; whilst in the beautiful andante, the absence is described with marvellous correctness; a tone of true resignation pervades this veritable gem of a musical and psychological picture; we cannot resist sympathising with the one who is left alone and who is deeply sad. Towards the end Beethoven describes in a truly masterly way the excitement, the anxiety, the impatience of awaiting the return; with a shout of joy the returned friend rushes into the arms of the expectant one, and the excitement, almost amounting to frenzy, which is here expressed is the most correct portraiture of such a scene. How touchingly is a phrase that expresses the height of happiness repeated over and over again, both in the treble and the bass; indeed, if we think of the state of our feelings in such sad moments of parting, of our melancholy during the absence of one we love, and of our exuberant joy on the return, we shall find that Beethoven's description of these emotions is not only correct, but absolutely perfect.

Performance.—Sonata, Op. 81, "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour."

For my second illustration I have selected the beautiful Sonata No. 30, Op. 109. I may here repeat, that between the later sonatas of Beethoven and his earlier ones a great difference is to be observed. Whilst in the earlier works he is most concise and strict as to form and construction, in the later works he shows an inclination to widen the barriers of form, and to present a regular tone-poem, conceived by fancy and warmed by a sincerity of feeling, quite unrivalled in the history of composition. Indeed, one of the chief features of Beethoven's last works is the development of melody, the desire to make not only the principal theme as much a song as possible, but to give such singing expression also to the supplementary parts that form the harmony. The effect thus achieved is characterised by a dreamy, a meditative expression, and no longer evinces that firmness, compactness, and strict conciseness that render Beethoven's earlier sonatas such marvels of composition. It is well known that towards the end of his life, owing to his complete deafness, Beethoven became more and more inclined to solitude. Unable—through extreme nervousness—to communicate his ideas to others, incapacitated from understanding answers to his questions, he retired at last altogether from the world, and lived a life of dreary and melancholy loneliness. Music was his only solace, his only comfort—and we cannot wonder that these last compositions express at once deep melancholy, a feeling of anger, and last, not least, a beautiful devotion, or rather resignation, to his inevitable fate. In none of the later sonatas are these various feelings more vividly expressed than in the Sonata Op. 109. The first movement expresses contemplation; the second, energy and strong will; the third, touching resignation. It is almost impossible fully to describe in words the beauties of a musical work; and, therefore, I will not waste time on mere eulogies, which no one requires less than Beethoven. The illustrious master's music speaks best for itself. But it may, perhaps, not be superfluous to draw your more particular attention to the last movement, an air with six variations. The air itself is of transcendent beauty; Beethoven indicates the way how to play it by the direction: "Singing and with the sincerest expression." Variation I. is simply an enlargement of the "singing and sincere expression." It shows, if possible, still greater warmth and a still more affectionate feeling than the theme. Variation II. is distinguished by a character of extreme lightness and airiness; in four bars only these floating passages appear in a more substantial manner, but the delightful staccato expression is taken up and continued to Variation III. In this, the composer alters not only the time (from 3-4 into 2-4) but also the character of the piece. Firm, energetical, this variation seems like the expression of a manly resolve, a determination not to give way to entire despondency; musically speaking, it is an excellent relief, and stands out in striking contrast to the following Variation IV., which has to be played slower than the theme; this slackening of the time is also highly favourable for the clear execution and understanding of the graceful figure with which the air is here surrounded. In Variation V. the manly feeling of the composer is again evinced, the measure changes from 3-4 into common time, and the whole is expressive of earnestness, energy, and a certain obstinacy. Variation VI. returns to the triple time, which is widened into 9-8 time. On the whole, this last variation is the least effective, and its degree of beauty is inferior to that of the preceding variations. It presents, however, a difficulty to the executant which might be compared to that which besets the helmsman of a ship when he has to avoid coming into contact with a certain dangerous rock. The dangerous musical rock is here the shake that is kept up throughout not less than thirty bars; if undue prominence is given to the shake, the passage sounds like the shake-study in B major by John Baptist Cramer; but, with all due respect for Cramer as an educational composer, such a reminiscence would appear as bathos at the conclusion of one of the most beautiful sonatas of Beethoven; and, I think, we may take it for granted, that the composer here imagined the shake more as a soft vibration of the atmosphere, and not as the technical figure, which gives brilliancy and lustre to the execution. But, take it as we will, this prolonged shake always remains a highly questionable and dangerous device of the composer.

For the momentary suspense and uncertainty thus created, we are however consoled by the re-introduction of the beautiful principal theme, which closes the whole work in the most poetical and satisfactory manner.

Performance.—Sonata in E major, Op. 109, No. 30.

For the last illustration I have selected the Sonata in C minor No. 32, Op. 111. This wonderful work appeared for the first time in April, 1823, four years before Beethoven's death. It consists of two movements only. Schindler, the so-called friend of Beethoven, mentions that when he asked the composer why he had not written a third movement, Beethoven replied, "The time was too short." I do not consider this reason a valid one, in so far as the beginning of Beethoven's autograph MS. shows the date, 13th January, 1822, and as the Sonata itself was published fifteen months later, there is no doubt that there was plenty of time to write a third movement, if the composer had deemed it necessary. But it is difficult to imagine what character this third movement would have had; both the first and second movements are eminently finished and thoroughly complete in themselves, and stand in such a striking contrast to each other, that to ordinary judges the idea of a third movement seems to suggest an anti-climax. The first movement opens with a maestoso in common time; at once we acknowledge the presence of an earnest, grand, and noble mind; we recognise the genius that 23 years earlier produced the "Sonata Pathétique;" but these 23 years had exercised a powerful influence on the feelings of the unfortunate composer; in this last sonata the feeling is deeper, the shadows are darker, the earnestness appears more intense; indeed, here we behold the veteran who has struggled through a life full of sorrow, whilst in the "Sonata Pathétique" we mark the young composer fresh in body and in mind. In this last sonata we seek in vain for those sweet strains which delight us in the slow movement of the "Sonata Pathétique," nor are we struck by that gentle tenderness which appears in so sympathetic and touching a guise in the Rondo of the earlier Sonata. The opening chords of the Maestoso prepare us for something unusual, for something far above the ordinary world of feeling; the clouds soon gather darkly, looming lower and lower across the heavens, and a fierce storm of the elements seems to break forth in the Allegro con brio ed appassionata. Instead of the customary second subject we have here only a short phrase, descriptive of a fervent prayer for pity and grace; but this woeful sentence is at once lost in the returning storm that rages again and again in terrible force. Towards the end of this wonderful first movement, the elements seem to calm themselves, their thundering force is broken, and their rolling sound is now only heard in the distance; calmness and peace return, and anxiety, fear and terror are past.

The second movement is an Arietta in C major in the unusual time of 9-16; it is followed by four variations. The character of the theme is one full of devotion; indeed, it resembles a prayer, in which a faithful congregation beseech the Almighty to grant them mercy and peace; the purity and simplicity, the naturalness and fervour, of these 16 bars are truly wonderful, only a sincere and religious man could be inspired by such an idea. Haydn called Beethoven an atheist, but Beethoven's God was not a deity of wrath and vengeance; he looked to God as to his personal Father, in whom he trusted, and to whom he lifted up the voice of prayer in times of trouble. The star that shone bright and friendly over the dark solitude of his existence was the love of God.

With regard to the variations, much has been writen for and against them; some critics denounced them as insipid, others lauded them as the image and reflex of Heaven itself. But taking a more prosaic and practical view, we find that they are simply a splendid elaboration and enhancement of the natural beauty exemplified in the arietta. Each variation is greater than its predecessors in life, substance, and expression. Variation IV. leads into a kind of free fantasia, which brings us to the end of the whole work. My audience will observe that in this movement it is again the shake to which is entrusted a most important part, and with respect to its proper performance I may be allowed to say that in the present instance it is even more difficult to carry out the composer's intention than in the Sonata No. 30. After having heard—as it were—the theme in full chorus, in all its splendour and might, the finishing variation, which is supported by the shake, should produce a kind of ethereal effect, a sort of glorification or apotheosis of the arietta. This is one of the rare instances in which we remark the deplorable influence of Beethoven's deafness, which prevented him from clearly realising the effects of his lofty ideas, which he imagined could be rendered on the piano—which instrument, however, with all its undoubted merits, is subject to certain restrictions and imperfections caused by the nature of its construction. No single instrument could attain the effect which Beethoven expected. To do this a whole orchestra would be required.

Performance.—Sonata No. 32, Op. 111.

In summing up our remarks on Beethoven's earlier and later Sonatas, we may say that his 32 model-works in this form are a complete monument of the musical art. We possess two invaluable books of musical wisdom, over which time has passed without doing them the slightest injury, and which seem to be destined to give to our successors as much joy and delight as these great works have already given to our ancestors and are now giving to ourselves. These two books of wisdom are Sebastian Bach's 48 Preludes and Fugues, and Beethoven's 32 Pianoforte Sonatas. In listening to them a feeling of awe overcomes us, similar to our sensations on entering a noble cathedral; a feeling of vastness, of majestic grandeur overpowers us, and we seem to stand in the presence of the Divine. In these works the highest mission is fulfilled that music can have, these Sonatas echo in our hearts like a divine voice calling us to soar above the cares and sorrows of this nether world. No feeling that thrills through the human heart but finds a sympathetic chord in Beethoven: grief and joy, he has an expression for each; and the more we study him the more we become impressed with the inexhaustible wealth which his music offers us. With Beethoven the intellectual, the grand and genial as exhibited in the modulations and combinations of sound, overstep the regular form, and is not the result of a passing mood of feeling, or of chance moments of inspiration; it is, in fact, the exhibition of tone-pictures, all possessing the richest fulness of power, and revelling in the inexhaustible wealth of variety, with which they strike our enraptured ear. If we devote ourselves to the study of music in its essence, scaling its heights and diving into its depths, we find in it the echo of every sudden feeling, of every striving after the sublime, that lies concealed in the recesses of the human soul. And as in such a genius as Sebastian Bach we recognise the principle of law and order, so does Beethoven appear to speak to us of that infinite revelation of charity and love that leads us onward to higher things—that seems to pour the balm of the mercy of Heaven on every heart that aches on earth. For Beethoven himself has said, and he had a right to say it: "Art is a bond that unites all the world—and true art endures for ever!"

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

It may not be sufficiently known, that these concerts now begin at 3.10, instead of 3 o'clock as formerly. This is a great convenience, as many passengers arrive at the low level station by the 2.50 train, and are quite unable to get tickets and reach the concert-room in ten minutes, to say nothing of the delay often occasioned by the unpunctuality of the train. I remarked some months ago that an alteration was desirable, and probably some one of greater influence was of the same opinion, and has brought about the desired change. There is now no excuse for parties coming late into the concert-room and thus annoying the conductor and those who are in time for the first piece on the programme.

Of the "Scotch" Symphony I need only say that it was splendidly played and cordially received.

Señor Sarasate, on his appearance, met with quite an ovation, and his performance of Mendelssohn's concerto roused the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, as it was played with an inspiration and perfection very rarely equalled. Nothing could exceed his beautiful expression in the exquisite andante. Heine says that "perfumes are the feelings of flowers," and expression is to music what the perfume is to the flower. The fantasia from "Carmen" brought out many specialties of Sarasate's playing, especially the downward chromatic progression preparatory to the re-entrance of his theme; this is done to perfection, but he unconsciously uses it much too frequently.

Of Mr. Cowen's clever work a few words only can now be said. We may often judge from certain defects of style, which are of modern, indeed of quite recent date, that the composer is young and ambitious, hoping by spasmodic and desperate efforts to gain a reputation, but which can end in nothing but failure. Mr. Cowen is inclined to follow a more patient course, and not to forsake the only path that can lead to lasting fame. This is evident in his present work, composed entirely for strings. If it had not been intrinsically good, the ear would have tired of it long before the end, and the greatest praise that can be given is to be able to say that the interest in the suite was kept up to the end of the last number.

Mdlle. Elly Warnots sang extremely well, but one is really getting tired of Rode's Variations.

There will be no Saturday concert on the 24th of March, the next taking place on the 31st.

Another contributor writes:—

Mr. Manns, a German, does more for "British interests," or "national talent," than the old Philharmonic. Mr. F. Cowen's "Suite," whereof I leave Dr. Sloman to give a faithful account, is dainty music skilfully written, and with a dash of old-world flavour, yet quite original. The clever construction and effective arrangement for a string band, produce, as a result, a most charming tone-picture, pleasing in outline, and in every way satisfactory, both to the musician and the amateur.

Señor Sarasate, as before, marred the last movement of the violin concerto by taking it at so terrific a speed. Miss Elly Warnots excelled in Mozart's difficult bravura air from "Die Zauberflöte," with its abnormally high range, but Rode's air should now repose in peace on the dusty shelf.

On the occasion of the director's grand night, when the Hall is always crowded by his friends, criticism, even if necessary—and it is not necessary—would be a breach of etiquette. The artists know their texts by heart, and have them, literally, at their fingers' ends.

It is needless to illuminate the works of Mr. A. Chappell's "various masters," many of them accepted as of perennial value, and all fairly respected. The long list of recalls, if enumerated, would only tire the reader. Every one was recalled, and every one would have been encored, but for the director's kindly appeal for mercy, at the end of a long and fagging season.

It is satisfactory to rest assured that the Popular Concerts, without any aid of flaming promises or appeals to a vulgar public, continue their deservedly prosperous course, and that they will be resumed early in November. A few words in season, and at the end of the season, for Mr. Willis, Mr. Saunders, and other active "scouts"—so to speak—of Messrs. Chappell and Co. They have to discharge very arduous duties, and they do their work well.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The last concert of the season attracted a large and—even for a Popular Concert—unusually enthusiastic audience. The following programme was given:—

Quartet in A major, Op. 18, No. 5, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Beethoven.
MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.
Air, "If with all your hearts" ("Elijah") ..... Mendelssohn.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Polonaise in C major, Op. 89, for pianoforte alone.. Beethoven.
Mdlle. Marie Krebs.
Sonata, "Il Trillo del Diavolo," for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment..... Tartini.
Herr Joachim.
Air, "Adelaide" ..... Beethoven.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Accompanied by Mdlle. Marie Krebs.
Quintet in E flat, Op. 44, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Schumann.
Mdlle. Marie Krebs, MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Mr. Zerbini.

Beethoven never created a melody more adapted for variations, more simple and graceful, than that which forms the subject of the slow movement in the above quartet. Rising and falling on successive tones and semitones of the scale—a characteristic of some of Beethoven's most beautiful melodies, as has frequently been pointed out—it has suggested five of the most interesting variations that have been left us by the great master of that form of composition. They were grandly rendered on this occasion, and evidently thoroughly enjoyed by performers and audience. The almost magical transformation which the melody undergoes in the fourth variation by the altered accompaniment—how different from the conventional and uninspired minor number that custom bids us look for among its major companions!—and the delightful arrangement of the parts in the third, will surely haunt the memory of all those whose good fortune it was to assist at this truly perfect performance. It is perhaps bold to say, though it is by no means bold to think, that the airs with variations of the Mozart-

Beethoven period are either an unbearable bore, or a sublime inspiration: the former is the rule, and this is one of the glorious and (thankfully may be added) numerous exceptions.

Mdlle. Marie Krebs won the usual encore for her brilliant rendering of Beethoven's effective Polonaise. Herr Joachim was stormily applauded after Tartini's ever-welcome sonata, and he added (not in his most perfect form) a Paganini Caprice to the programme. Mr. Zerbini's accompaniments were not so sympathetic as could be desired. Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was in good voice, rendered the songs he had chosen with his usual taste and refinement.

And now the critic's task is done for the season—having had little to blame (in the performance, whatever may be thought about the selections) and much to admire. We were dismissed with the genial melodies of Schumann's Quintet in our ears, to find their way—as such earnest outpourings of melody always must find their way, sooner or later—to every heart capable of receiving living impressions through the medium of the language of music.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The third concert of the season was given on the evening of the 15th inst., and again was a full audience drawn to St. James's Hall, there being hardly standing-room. A large portion consisted of Wagnerites drawn together to worship at the shrine of their deity, while the announcement that Sarasate was going to play evidently attracted a considerable number of those present.

The following was the programme:—

Overture, "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"	Wagner.
"Einleitung und Isolde Liebestod" ("Tristan und Isolde")
"Der Ritt der Walküren" ("Die Walküre")
Charfreitags-Zauber ("Parsifal")
Lied, "Traft ihr das Schiff im Meere an" ("Der Fliegende Holländer")
Mdme. Valleria.
Overture, "Der Fliegende Holländer".....	Wagner.
Concerto for violin, "Scotch" (first time in England) (Conducted by the Composer). Señor Sarasate.	Max Bruch.
Prayer, "Elisabeth's Prayer" ("Tannhäuser").... Mdme. Valleria.	Wagner.
Violin Solos— "Romance" } "Danse Espagnole" (first time) } ..... Señor Sarasate.	Sarasate.
Overture, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn.

It will be seen from the above, that the first part of the concert was entirely occupied with excerpts from the works of Wagner. The deceased composer was not only an honorary member of the society, but he had also been one of its conductors, having directed the season of 1855—apparantly a disastrous one. It was therefore but fitting that the event of his death should be formally noticed by the Philharmonic; his connection with the society, as well as the exalted place Wagner has held in the musical world of the day, certainly entitled him to this mark of respect from the leading English musical association. The task of selecting from Wagner's works representative music fitted for concert-room use is not easy. The Bayreuth master has written but little purely orchestral music. According to the theory as laid down in his latest utterances, the art music-drama is an intimate union of poetry, music, scenery, and action. These elements and their cognates, therefore, are indissoluble, and the severance of any one of them must seriously militate against a proper representation of the author's conception. To sing or play in the concert-room extracts from Wagner's operas, is to set his cardinal principle at defiance, and to wrench strictly dramatic music from its necessary stage associations. If it succeeds in this mutilated form, then is proved false the distinct principle on which it is announced to be constructed. Success in such an event is equivalent to "hoisting the engineer with his own petard." But one cannot blame the directors of the Philharmonic for their essay; they are but following in the steps of the inconsistent composer himself. When a few years ago Wagner conducted at the Albert Hall some special concerts of his own carefully selected music, this is the very thing he himself did. So that he has publicly violated the important principle that he and his devoted followers have asserted to be the only true and perfect method on which the music-drama can be constructed. The question as to whether the experiment performed under these conditions is successful, is one which each auditor must determine for himself; the effect produced on the critics and many good musicians seems to have been unsatisfactory. Paradoxical as it may seem, one is unable clearly to determine whether this result is not a justification of Wagner's theories; to succeed means to fail in a certain sense, while to fail implies the truth of the creed, so imperatively insisted on.

Now as to the music performed. The overture to the "Master-singers of Nuremburg," like its kindred prelude to "Tannhäuser," is a splendid tone-picture, complete in itself, and quite adapted for concert-room use. It is impossible to give a satisfactory account of so complex a work; but to those who know this opera, and have heard the overture performing its intended duty, as introducing that admirable delineation of German mediæval life, the performance of the prelude vividly recalled Wagner's clever comic opera. The overture does not possess the massive breadth and passionate intensity that the "Tannhäuser" boasts, but it shows its author's constructive power to have been really great. Though it is extraordinarily complicated, requiring a trained ear to distinguish and appreciate the various themes so ingeniously blended together, it is yet a grand sonorous piece of pompous music that all can appreciate. It may be objected that its materials are too overwrought, and that owing to the free employment of the brass throughout, there is felt towards the close a want of that increasingly intensified effect that is to be found in most of the overtures of the great masters. This is probably true, but we must yet acknowledge the picturesque work as one that genius alone could create. The performance was a good one, though slightly ragged in places. The "Introduction and Isolde's Death," from "Tristan und Isolde," is certainly not effective in the concert-room. Some maintain that on the stage itself, surrounded with all the accessories that the composer has deemed necessary for its perfect appreciation, it is vague and wearisome. Although long, it consists of one main theme, not in itself attractive, worked to death, and tortuously reiterated until the movement becomes excessively monotonous and tedious. Wagner is rarely content with saying a good thing once only; he repeats it again and again, with no, or little, variation, till the diffuseness shown becomes inexpressibly tiring to the jaded ear. "The Valkyries' Ride," is one of the most extraordinary pieces of music ever written, so daringly fresh in form, and bewilderingly original. It produced an immense effect in the opera, where it illustrates and accompanies, during a terrible storm, the dead warriors borne through the clouds by the Walkyries on horseback to Walhalla. A few years ago this would have been laughed at as the frenzied dream of a maniac, and denounced as terrifically noisy pantomime music. But now it has been heard so often, that it has become well known to our concert habitués, and finds wide acceptance as a wonderful representation of natural and unnatural scenes. The "adaptation" used was made by Wagner for the concert-room, but the piece distinctly suffered from the absence of the vocal element and scenic adjuncts. The extract was not well played, the violins being too loud throughout, the remarkable bold theme enunciated on the brass not standing out with sufficient clearness; nevertheless, an encore was demanded, and conceded.

The introduction of the orchestral piece termed "Charfreitags-Zauber" (Good Friday magic), arranged from a scene of Wagner's last work, "Parsifal," is to be condemned.

So much has been written as to the blasphemous character of this music-drama, an incongruous mixture of the legends attaching to early Christianity, sorcery, high ethics, and sensual passion, that it is needless now to comment on its offensiveness. Despite the religious mysticism running through the work, it is neither a mediæval miracle play, nor is it a sacred drama after the fashion of the Oberammergau Passion Play. The esoteric symbolism with which it deals is the most awful of those mysteries connected with the Christian faith. Even in old times, the clerical authorities who controlled plays connected with religious subjects, would never have licensed the treatment of such a theme; certainly in this age of the world's civilisation, the Church, and not the stage, is the proper place for the commemoration of the Eucharist. As a sort of apology to the outer world, it was announced that the work would never be given outside Bayreuth. Nevertheless, there were many onlookers who predicted that the devoted adherents of Wagner would after a time make every effort to have the opera performed in London. And unless the Lord Chamberlain's department returns an emphatic, No! to the libretto submitted for approval, its production here is probably but a mere question of time and opportunity. Already some excerpts have found their way into our concert-rooms, and have thus paved the way for the introduction of the complete work. Perhaps when our people see the voluptuous animalism of the passionate Kundry, jumbled with a travesty of the Holy Communion on the stage, the psychological experiment presented to their gaze will cause more stir over the matter than the voices of warning critics have yet done. The Annotator of the programme book, ignoring both his practice and his duty, in the brief notice of the "Charfeitags-Zauber," said, it would not "be advisable to lable (sic) the melodies with fictitious names." He was wise; but the omission can be supplied without difficulty. In the Crystal Palace Saturday Concert Programme Book of the 3rd inst. (on which date the piece was first performed) is a careful description and analysis of it from the pen of a recognised and most able Wagnerian authority. We there find the Leit motives numbered 6, 7, and 8, respectively entitled, "The Atonement," "The Sacramental Formula of the Love Feast," and "The Spear and the Saviour's Agony." After mentioning these particulars, one is not surprised to find that, commenting on the matter, one of our foremost critics writes:—

"As a specimen of the abuse of sacred things by an infidel composer, it will be sufficient to note that 'The Sacramental Formula of the Love Feast' is a parody of the Lord's Supper; that Kundry's repentance and baptism are parodies of the scenes between our Saviour and Mary Magdalen, and that 'The Spear and the Saviour's Agony' are leit motiven combined in the concluding portion of this 'Parsifal' selection."

A few words will suffice as to the musical aspect of the arrangement played. It is a quiet, dreamy piece of writing, expressive in places, though at times confused, and too much spun out.

Madame Valleria is doubtless the best Senta that has been seen on the stage, and she gave a passionate rendering of the fine scena, "Yohohoe"; but exception must be taken to her exaggeration of the accents at the beginning of the first four lines. Her delivery of "Elizabeth's Prayer" from "Tannhäuser" was admirable. This melodious Prayer is a type that Wagner has long ago abjured; the only fault that can be found with it is the accompaniment of the wind throughout, a continuato which becomes monotonous, and causes one to miss the absence of the bright and sympathetic strings. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which concluded the Wagner selection, cannot rank high beside his other operatic preludes; but a careful student of its orchestration will see that the composer was there trying effects that he embodied and developed with success in his subsequent works. There is an effective use of the cor anglais after the opening, but the overture is noisy at times, and it contains odd reminiscences of many composers.

What could have induced the Philharmonic Directors to accept Max Bruch's new—so-called—violin concerto was the wonderment of the cognoscenti present. It was unquestionably one of the weakest and most inane pieces of music that has ever graced their programmes. In the first place, its name is a misnomer; it is no Concerto at all, but rather a formless Fantasia, with a free (indeed very "free") use of Scottish melodies. The Liverpool ex-conductor ought to know that a concerto proper must contain its proper number of movements and of subjects, and that there are certain orthodox arrangements as to construction and consecution of keys to which respect must be paid. He is either ignorant of all this, or he has boldly determined to change the entire form of the type, and give to the world an improvement on it. Great has been his failure. If he had labelled his production "Free Fantasia on Scotch airs," criticism to some extent would have been disarmed; but to adopt the honoured title of Concerto for his flimsy and clumsily constructed piece, constitutes an act of impertinence towards English common sense. Several of the great composers have introduced a national air in their concertos, and have skilfully treated it as the main idea of the movement. If Herr Bruch had done this, no fault could have been found with his design; but to take about a dozen Scotch airs, to chop off fragments of them, and then to alter and mutilate the well-known texts, cannot be commended, even if some fancy and scholarship were displayed over the piecing together. But these qualities are wanting in the piece. In this case, at least, it cannot be said of Herr Bruch what Dr. Johnson wrote of Goldsmith, nihil tetigit quod non ornavit. The music throughout is heavy, laboured, and uninteresting, and in many places it is even trivial and common-place. There are some showy variations for the violin, accompanied by the inevitable harp, very much of a pattern that one hears in the streets of Edinburgh, but invention and clever treatment of the themes may be looked for in vain. It is said that the composer has published a work on Scotch airs; if his researches had extended to the bagpipes, and he had introduced that national instrument of torture to the Philharmonic audience, it might have created some interest, and relieved the character of his whimsical idea of a concerto. Among the airs introduced was a fragment of "Sally in our alley," written by Carey. It is, perhaps, excusable that Herr Bruch and his annotator Herr Hüeffer should be unaware that the air is thoroughly English, and not Scotch. The thought crossed one's mind that Herr Bruch had mistaken his locale, and that the work should have been given on some Scottish festival night at the Promenade Concerts, rather than before a classical Philharmonic audience. A caustic critic has recommended that the composer of "Odysseus"—produced at the recent Bach concert—should take his work over to America on his trip, and drop it in mid-ocean. If this advice is adopted, and he will add thereto the new "Violin Concerto," the only being likely to regret the occurrence is the unfortunate fish that might swallow the MSS. The work was altogether unworthy of Sarasate's powers, though he did all for it that an able artist could do. Of his own pieces, the "Romance" was specially noteworthy, a passage he introduced in it of delicate harmonics, accompanied with pizzicato arpeggios, served to bring to remembrance one of Paganini's most effective devices. Spanish dances seem pretty much alike; he was encored in his new one, and substituted the charming arrangement of Chopin's lovely Nocturne in E flat, played with the most perfect tone and exquisite taste. Mendelssohn's magnificent "Ruy Blas" overture, admirably given by the band under Mr. Cusin's painstaking direction, brought this remarkable concert to a close.

LEEDS.

On Friday evening, 16th inst., Bach's "Passion Music" ("St. Matthew") was sung in Leeds parish church before a large congregation. The principal vocalists were as follows: soprano, Mrs. George; contralto, Miss A. Clarke; tenors, Messrs. Binns and Grimshaw; basses, Messrs. Morton and Hunter. The ordinary choir of the church was increased to about 100, including thirty female voices. The whole performance was gone through in a manner that showed very careful training, and principals and chorus did their share of the work in a thoroughly conscientious manner. The "Passion Music" has been given in this church in previous years, and, perhaps, nothing more appropriate could be found for the season of Lent. Of course it would be out of place to criticise a performance of this sort in detail. The beautiful chorales with which the work abounds were given in admirable style, and special mention may be made of the grand and impressive opening chorus, "Come, ye daughters, weep with me;" of the unaccompanied chorales in Part II., "O Lord, who dares to smite Thee?" "Commit thy ways to Jesus," and of the final double chorus, "In tears of grief we here recline." As regards the ladies' share of the work, we may state that Mrs. George sang with much feeling the lovely air, "Jesus, Saviour, I am Thine," and was heard to advantage in the duet with Miss Clarke at the close of Part I., "My Saviour, Jesus, now is taken." Miss Clarke sang the contralto music in a refined and devotional manner, and special mention must be made of her exquisite rendering of those beautiful airs, "Have mercy upon me," "Ah! Golgotha," and "See, the Saviour's outstretched arm." Dr. Creser presided at the organ with his usual efficiency. During the interval, a short, appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. F. G. Hume Smith, and a collection was made to defray expenses. The "Passion Music" was repeated on Tuesday evening, the 20th inst.

MR. BONAWITZ'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Mr. J. B. Bonawitz resumed his serial concerts at his residence in the Marylebone Road, on the afternoon of March 14th. He conducted his own Pianoforte Trio in C minor, Op. 37, of which a good report was given on the occasion of its first performance (December 20th, 1882). Miss Cecilie Brousil and Mr. Hann held the strings. Miss C. Brousil introduced a new piece from the pen of Mr. Bonawitz, a "Concerto Dramatique" in A Minor, a dignified recitative, followed by a florid bravura, very much and deservedly admired. Mr. Bonawitz selected for his solos an air with variations of Handel, in D minor, and two movements of Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (the second and third). As a tribute to the memory of Wagner, the pianist began the concert with Beethoven's Funeral March in A flat minor (fourth Sonata, Op. 26), and Liszt's selections from "Lohengrin," executed in a masterly style. The vocalist, Miss E. Millar, sang an air from Gounod's opera, "Cinq Mars," and Tosti's "Good-bye."

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

MARCH 20th.

Mr. Henry Grimshaw gave his nineteenth organ recital on the fine organ in Great George Street Chapel last evening, the programme of which will be found in the proper column. Mr. Grimshaw does not neglect the works of living writers for the organ. His first piece was a Fantasia in C minor, by Dr. C. J. Frost, which was very effective. The variations from the septuor always give scope for variety of registering, and Mr. Grimshaw was very happy in his effects.

Gounod's "Redemption" is to be produced by the Liverpool Philharmonic Society this day. If we may judge by the rehearsal, the performance will not be of the best. The chorus sang very badly; there was a want of attack, and the tone was poor and thin. In fact, the choruses (what few I heard) were given in the most listless manner, and contrasted strangely with the finished and con amore rendering of the Birmingham Festival Choir. The principals engaged for the performance are Miss Anna Williams, Mdme. Billinie Porter, Mdme. Isabel Fassett, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Bridson. Mr. W. T. Best will preside at the organ, and Mr. Max Bruch will conduct.

Several concerts of a popular type are announced for Good Friday and Easter week. J. J. M.

THE IRISH CONCERT AT THE ALBERT HALL.

Mr. Wm. Carter held an Irish Concert at the Albert Hall on Saturday evening, March 17th, in honour of St. Patrick's Day. The audience was a large one, but, as usual, behaved idiotically in that they protracted the concert by "recalling" every individual artist! Mr. Carter's choir sang part-songs arranged from familiar Irish airs, and the Scots Guards' band played. Mdme. Trebelli sang splendidly an air from Rossini's effete opera, "L'Italiana in Algieri," and Mr. Carter's song (composed for her), "What the waves said." Mdme. Marie Roze delighted her audience with Moore's song, "Believe me, if all those endearing young charms," and "Terence's Farewell," producing the "brogue" so nicely that the fair Frenchwoman must surely have kissed the "blarney-stone" some time or other. "The minstrel boy," a clap-trap effusion at best, was encored, partly for the sake of Mdme. Trebelli, its interpreter. Mdme. Enriquez, Mr. Maas, Mr. R. Hollins, Mr. Maybrick, and other favourite vocalists, were recalled, and many of their songs encored. A welcome relief to so much Hibernian matter was a violin solo of Mr. J. B. Poznanski, the Fantasia (in A) of Vieuxtemps on "St. Patrick's Day in the morning." This is a difficult piece. It begins with an introduction, and, after due delivery of the air, occurs an elaborate cadenza, after a pause on the (suspended) chord of D, the subdominant. The air is then repeated, and at the close the violinist has to "double stop" two-part harmonies, with trills, and afterwards to wind up with harmonics, in octaves, tenths, twelfths, and seventeenths. The fire-eating player, on an encore, gave his own arrangement of "Garry Owen," a clever imitation of bag-pipe effects. The concert was so protracted that many of the audience left at eleven o'clock, in a state of musical collapse. There was to be a performance of the "Messiah" on Good Friday evening.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPOSER.

IV.

UNQUESTIONABLY the composer has more difficulties to face in his upward career than any other class of art producer is called upon to encounter. To get his works performed is even a greater difficulty than the other serious trial of getting them into print. The subject of securing adequate performance is the one difficulty which more than any other tends to prevent the proper recognition of the producer of music. Years of anxiety and disappointing trials in this direction have held back some of our best composers, until indeed they might be said to have reached that period of existence which Dante tells us is "Il mezzo del "cammin di nostra vita." And it is no injustice to our rising and eminent composers whose larger works are from time to time presented before the public, to say that they owe their opportunities as much to their social advantages as to their artistic merits. Now and then a composer, seeing no other available plan, takes upon himself the responsibility of producing some work he is prepared to stake his reputation upon. Such a step, of course, is as unwise as would be the proposal of an unknown poet to publicly recite his own verses. The truth is, the public mind must be prepared for the reception of any new musical work by a composer as yet unknown to fame. Nay, it is humiliating to remember in this age of education and liberal public patronage, how many moving springs there are apart from the desire to recognise merit, which must be set in motion before people are ready to listen to a new musical work of any pretensions from the pen of an unknown composer. It has been said that we are still in art matters much in the condition of the wild Red Indians, willing to swallow any potion prepared by a "Big Medicine Man," but averse to the acceptation of any performance not sanctified by some preliminary form of recognition of the person who may claim public attention. This superstitious faith in the successful shows that we have but little sound judgment of our own to rely upon, and that we dislike to have to trust to our own unbiassed and unprepared opinions. In truth, the composer has but small hope of appreciation until he is surrounded by a friendly atmosphere. It is, therefore, quite useless for any composer to hope for genuine success until his pathway to publicity has been duly secured by friendly offices and the general estimation of a large circle. So the efforts made by a composer to secure the attention and appreciation of an unprepared, and, one may add, generally unwilling public, are nearly as futile as would be an attempt to interest the aboriginal inhabitants of Kratchatka in the perusal of KANT'S "Critical Philosophy." The young composer must not, indeed, expect to strike the world at first with a work of an ambitious character, unless he has the good fortune to have such solid, social power at his back as will secure a sufficiently friendly atmosphere. He will do much more wisely if he prepares a way for himself by building up a character which commands esteem for the man, before he attempts to claim appreciation for the productions of the artist. Most of these observations are also applicable to the case of the executive artist; but the executant has many more opportunities and is much more readily understood and appreciated by the general public than is the tone-producer. However, these considerations are not intended to deepen despondency, but to encourage prudence in the pursuit of the composer's career. Fortes fortuna juvat is not without an application in the case of one who, possessing heaven-born talents, is surely bound to use them to such advantage as his station and position will permit.

Digitized by Google

ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

V.

ONE general observation with regard to the transference of orchestral music to the key-board of the pianoforte is called for. This is, the fact that it is often deemed necessary to give fuller harmonies to the drawing-room orchestra than are involved in the expression of the same ideas by the more sonorous instruments of the band. At first sight it would seem that the chords of the orchestra by reason of its comprehensive and extensive score would be naturally fuller than their representative harmonies as rendered on the pianoforte. The reasons for this apparent discrepancy are not far to seek. The enormous power of the orchestra and its rich, vividly contrasted tone qualities, have the faculty of creating a large harmonic atmosphere, so to speak, a faculty but feebly developed on the key-board instruments, partly from the inevitable sameness of the sounds produced, especially on the pianoforte, and partly by reason of the feebleness of the accentuation of key-board instruments as compared with the strong and varied utterances of the orchestral forces. Thus it may happen that the stroke of the mass of strings in four-part, and widely distributed harmony, would have but a poor representation if re-produced in four-parts on the pianoforte. Such a passage, especially if calling for strongly marked accents, would require the full employment of both hands on the pianoforte, in order that anything like corresponding effects may be produced. The student should compare the thickly laid out chords in given passages of the arrangements, say of some of the classical symphonies, by such conscientious transcribers as HUMMEL, CZERNY, KALKBRENNER, etc., with the perspicuously scored harmonies of the original passages as laid out for the orchestra by their composers. There is no great power of harmonic concentration on the pianoforte; and massive harmonic effects must be approached by chords with largely doubled elements. Certain modern composers have failed to make us like thick harmonies in the lowest bass region of the orchestra, but such harmonies on the pianoforte key-board are not only free in occasional use from disagreeable effects, but are absolutely of great value in presenting ideas fully pronounced in a clearly scored and not overloaded orchestral passage for the instruments of tenor and bass compasses. This observation is equally applicable to the upper range of orchestral harmonies, and has its most forcible application naturally in attempts at the key-board representation of the forte combinations of the entire orchestra.

E. H. TURPIN.

ON THE CHOICE OF SOLO VOCAL MUSIC FOR THE CONCERT-ROOM.

THERE are two points concerning solo singers in the matter of programme-building which call for reformation. The first is in connection with the selection of songs, etc., as regards variety, and the second in the same direction bears upon the suitability of the choice made. It is no uncommon thing to find a vocal soloist living as it were for a month or two on less than half-a-dozen songs. Even the degrading obligations of the royalty system need not so limit the selection of a vocalist as to make it apparently necessary to associate an artist's name at a given period with the performance only of a slender stock of from two to four songs. In justice to themselves, our singers should take more pains to display their largely developed powers, by the execution of more extensive selections from the abundant stores of songs, forming probably the largest class of musical literature in existence. And it might be pointed out that from an artistic view, it is undesirable that a performer should be too long confined to the idioms and mannerisms of any given authors. The other matter is the judicious choice of songs with regard to proper surroundings and accompaniments. This would be secured at once by following the simple rule of always employing the accompaniments as written by the composer. There is no reason why singers should select songs requiring orchestral adornment for performance when only a pianoforte accompaniment is available. When the orchestra is absent and the pianoforte is present, let the singer select some of the many beautiful songs by SCHUBERT, MENDELSSOHN, STERNDALE BENNETT, R. FRANZ, H. SMART, GOUNOD, etc., which have artistically written pianoforte accompaniments. Such judgment on the part of our vocalists is especially called for in the formation of the programmes intended for concerts of classical reputation and established artistic importance.

THE WEST LONDON COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Signor Casano's College of Music and Dramatic Academy, in Colville Gardens, Bayswater, is a deservidly flourishing institution. At a soirée held there on March 15th, some excellent music regaled the ears of a select audience. Miss H. Sasse played a chaconne of Handel, a barcarolle of Rubinstein, and a valse of Chopin with much taste, and M. Poznanski gave Hauser's "Rhapsodie Horgroise," as a violin solo; also Vieuxtemps' fantasia on "Lucia." Several of the pupils sang in turn, and a comedietta in one act came at the end. Signor E. P. Casano conducted the concert.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

On the 20th, the usual Passion Week performance of Bach's "Passion Music" was given. A large congregation assembled, which included the Princess of Wales, dressed in black, and attended by Miss Knollys, Mr. W. H. Gladstone, Lord Coleridge, Lord Henry Somerset, the Bishop of London, as well as the Dean and Canons of St. Paul's. The short evening service which preceded and succeeded Bach's "Passion according to St. Matthew," was intoned by Minor Canon Kelly, and the Bishop of London pronounced the Benediction. The musical arrangements were under Dr. Stainer, the cathedral organist, who conducted; Mr. Martin presiding at the organ. The orchestra was efficient and well-balanced. The chief vocal parts were entrusted to Messrs. Kenningham, Hanson, Winn, and Kimpton.

Although it cannot be said that the delicate texture of much of the music is adapted for exposition in St. Paul's, the vast building outlined in soft, dim light, the awe-struck listeners, and the other impressive surroundings, make up a solemn picture, which heightens the effect of the wonderful tone poem. To those whose narrow-minded prejudices would limit the functions of music in connection with worship, no more instructive and humiliating experience could be imagined than the resistless eloquence of this notable Service. The sister arts of music and painting have truly been able to illustrate the greatest tragedy and the deepest mystery the history of the world can point to, with a fervour and power no pulpit eloquence has ever yet approached. And in Bach's settings of the divine and wondrous story, we have the most powerful tone-pictures sacred art can point to, notwithstanding the presence of the mannerisms of an almost too contrapuntal habit of thought here and there. The reverent, earnest dramatic power shown, and the profound contemplative sorrow are such as inevitably touch all listeners. And those who go to hear such Services come away with no thought of being called upon to criticise, but to record an earnestly and admirably conducted musical sermon. The authorities at St. Paul's Cathedral do no truer work than that of conducting the annual service which embodies one of the noblest sermons ever preached to sinful men—Bach's "Passion Music."

THE BROUSIL CHAMBER CONCERTS.

On the afternoon of March 15th, unfortunately the "Boat Race" day, Miss Wurm and Mr. A. Brousil played Rubinstein's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in D with great effect; and, reinforced by Miss Bertha Brousil and Mr. Collins, Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat. Miss Wurm's solo was Chopin's Ballade in G minor. Miss B. Brousil played, as violin solos, the "Pensées Fugitives" of Heller and Ernst, Nos. 3 and 9, in F and A major. The matinée was in every respect successful.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

An orchestral concert, given by the students of the Royal Academy on March 16th at St. James's Hall, once more afforded practical evidence of the good work that is being carried on by this old and valued institution. Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" was the chief item, and in this both band and chorus proved satisfactory, Mr. William Shakespeare being, as heretofore, the able conductor. A word of praise must be given to the excellent rendering of the soli parts by Miss Marion Burton, Mr. Hirwin Jones, and Mr. Lucas Williams. The composing faculty was represented by Mr. Herbert Smith's serenade, charmingly sung by Mr. Dyved Lewis, and two movements from Mr. G. J. Bennett's symphony, a work which evidences great skill and pronounced talents, but somewhat lacks continuity of thought. Miss Cantelo, who played Brahms's Concerto in D minor; Miss Margaret Devey, in a movement from Sir Julius Benedict's concerto; and Mr. Septimus Webbe, in Schumann's A minor Concerto, showed considerable ability as pianists. "Voi che sapete" was pleasingly sung by Miss Eleanor Rees. Mr. Prentice Chapman was down for a violin solo, and the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro" ended the concert. The "Walpurgis Night" produced a marked impression, as indeed it always will, for where in the advanced school can anything be found more dramatic? and be it remembered, that in addition to this quality, Mendelssohn's work is masterly in its plan, continuity of thought, and picturesque power.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Herr Elkner's annual concert was given at the Antient Concert Rooms on Saturday last. There was a very large and fashionable audience, including the Countess Spencer, who set a very desirable example, and showed her appreciation of the programme by arriving punctually and remaining to compliment Herr Elsner upon his success at the close of the concert. The programme was long, but so admirably arranged and executed, that one did not feel surfeited when the end was reached. Its length, however, precludes me from furnishing a detailed account of the various items. Miss Poole took part in a brace of duets with Mrs. Connolly, and sang two songs with considerable dramatic expression and taste. Mrs. Connolly was also applauded for "The Message" (Blumenthal) and Gounod's "Ave Maria." The instrumental items formed a prominent part in the scheme, and were performed with the thoroughness that distinguishes the performances of the members of the Dublin Chamber Music Union. The compositions performed included Raff's second Trio in G major for pianoforte (M. Billet) violin (Herr Lauer), and 'cello (Herr Elsner); Mendelssohn's Quartet in D major for two violins, viola, and 'cello; and a Trio for pianoforte (Miss Elsner), violin (Dr. Smyly), and 'cello (Herr Elsner) by Hummel, whose widow, by the way, died within the past couple of weeks. Herr Elsner gave his audience a treat by playing for the "first time in Dublin" a song without words ("Friede im Herzen") by Emile Gock and an arrangement of some 17th century ballet-music by Offenbach. He also amused them by a practical illustration of the term "Musette" as produced by the 'cello. M. Billet sustained his high reputation in a study by Henselt and a valse by Chopin. Mr. W. B. Martin and Mr. Roper-Caldbeck contributed vocally, whilst several of the songs were very much enhanced by the manner of Mr. Joseph Robinson's accompaniments.

MANCHESTER.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

On the 15th inst., Mr. Hallé gave us an opportunity of hearing, for the first time in Manchester, Gounod's "Redemption," the concert being given for the benefit of the Infirmary.

To anyone who was present at the first performance of the work at Birmingham the "reading" by Mr. Hallé was especially interesting, as the forces under his command were fully capable of giving an adequate interpretation of the work. All the points in the masterly orchestration were duly taken advantage of, and the "slips" were few and trivial. The flatness of the first horn, however, more than once interfered with the general harmony. The effect of the four trumpets in the finale to the second part was also slightly marred by the insufficient elevation of the players behind the chorus. The long and laborious "March to Calvary" was rendered unduly wearisome by the slow speed at which Mr. Hallé took this number. The ordinary march tempo is hardly applicable to such an extraordinary composition. At least the composer thought otherwise when he conducted at Birmingham. The choruses were all well done. Mrs. Hutchinson sang the soprano music, and very agreeably surprised her audience. She sang with great expression and taste, and did not seem overweighted; she reached her top C admirably.

In addition to the parts of our Saviour, Mr. Santley sang the whole of the bass narrator's music, and certainly he and Mr. Lloyd made more of their rather ungrateful parts than was done at Birmingham. Mdme. Patey sang the contralto music. Altogether the performance was a very successful one, and the work itself was very well received, the grand chorus "Unfold, ye Portals everlasting" working the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Both the merits and demerits of the work, which have already been discussed, were brought prominently into relief.

Four days before this performance, and while his talented daughter Miss Annie Goodwin was giving a highly successful concert, Mr. J. L. Goodwin breathed his last, at the somewhat early age of 55. Coming to Manchester as a young man from the West of England, Mr. Goodwin soon made for himself a name as a violinist, organist, and teacher. His talent, though not absolutely brilliant in itself, was the cause of brilliance in his pupils, for he was thorough, painstaking, indefatigable, and conscientious. He was highly respected and well known, and some surprise seemed to be felt that his decease was in no wise noticed by Mr. Hallé, who has lost a faithful servant of twenty-five years' standing. C. J. H.

THE "FAUST" OF HECTOR BERLIOZ.

The Faust-Sage, a very favourite theme, has been treated, vocally and instrumentally, and in all sorts of forms, by Spohr, Gounod, Berlioz, Boïto, Schumann, and Liszt. "La Damnation de Faust," first produced at Paris in 1846 (or 1847), is known to be in the form of a dramatic cantata, and to end, in rather a terrible fashion, with the descent of its hero to the "naughty place," as grandmammas were wont to emphasize the fabulous fires of Gehenna.

> Gnossius . . . . . subigitque fateri
> Quæ quis apud superos, furto lætatus inani,
> Distulit in seram commissa piacula mortem.

The "Faust" of Hector Berlioz, which proved so decided a failure at Her Majesty's Theatre, some six or seven years ago, when M. Pasdeloup came over from Paris to conduct the work, has since taken a firm hold of the British public. Mr. Arthur Chappell has found it a highly profitable enterprise; and now Mr. Barnby, of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, takes it up at least once every year. He repeated the cantata on the evening of March 14th, with Mdme. Valeria, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. H. Pyatt, and Mr. Santley in front of the orchestra. Suffice it to say, that the performance was perfectly successful, and that a large audience encored, as de rigueur, the "Racoczky," March in A, the Dance of Sylphs in D, and the serenade of friend "Mephisto" in B major.

The London Literary and Artistic Society are doing good work in their way. On the 14th Mr. Arthur Lilley read Shakespeare's "Hamlet" at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.

BELFAST.—There was a large attendance at a miscellaneous concert given in the large hall of the Methodist College on March 13th. The proceeds will be devoted to the founding of a musical library in the college. Mr. B. Hobson Carroll, Mus. Bac. T.C.L., was conductor, and his great musical abilities contributed largely to the enjoyment of the concert. The programme was chiefly sustained by pupils of the college, and the manner in which the items were given was extremely creditable.

LANCASTER HALL.—Mr. Russell Lochner gave a concert on the 12th. The vocalists included Mdme. Adeline Paget, Miss Frances Hipwell, Messrs. Kenningham, Kempton, and Frank Quatremayne. Miss F. Bromley (a pupil of the concert giver) played pianoforte solos with much credit to herself and teacher. Mr. R. W. Buttery was the violinist, Herr Oberthür the harpist, Mr. Russell Lochmer played Bach's "Toccata in C," and a movement by H. Smart, admirably upon the organ.

WIMBLEDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was the work selected for the eleventh concert of this flourishing suburban society on Thursday, 8th inst. Miss Alice Parry, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Orlando Christian being the principals, it is needless to say that the solos were each and all well rendered, but the duet "Quis est homo" and the two quartets "Sancta Mater" and "Quando corpus" were beautifully sung. The choruses, as usual with the exception of the "Pia Mater," which was somewhat false of intonation, went well and crisply, the greatest attention being paid to light and shade. Altogether both the choir and orchestra of this society are a credit alike to the conductor and the neighbourhood. The second part of the programme opened with Méhul's overture to "Joseph," and consisted of selections from various standard works—one of the most enjoyable items of this part being Mozart's "Ave verum." The whole of the selections were given with orchestral accompaniments, Mr. Sumner, the society's conductor, occupying his usual post. Considering the bitter coldness of the night, the concert was well attended. "Elijah" will be given on April 23rd.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

"Tripilla" is a new comic opera by Signor Luzzi.

A new opera, by Señor Reparaz, has been produced at Valencia, with the title "Il Favorito."

It is said that the young composer, Urich, has written an opera, "Il Giuramento."

Mr. Georges Boyer, of the Paris Figaro has won the Rossini Prize for the best lyric poem for music. The competitors numbered 169.

M. Limnander, a Belgian, has been elected the successor of Flotow as member of the Académie des Beaux Arts.

A new "Symphonie Funèbre," by M. Gustave Huberti, lately received a hearing in Brussels. The "Symphonie" is described as an interesting work by a learned and practical musician.

An unpublished opera, in four acts, called "Andolina," has been produced in Strasburg. The composer is Herr Müller-Reuter, professor of piano and harmony at the Conservatoire.

"Les Puits qui Parle," a one-act comic opera, has been successfully brought out at the Caen Theatre. M. Arthur Mancini's music is said to be bright and appropriate, and the libretto, by an anonymous writer, very amusing.

Signor Orsini, the composer of the opera of "Lola," produced at the Olympic Theatre, has died at a comparatively early age in Naples. He has left behind him some musical works, including a three-act opera, the plot of which is by Mr. Gilbert à Beckett, and the words by Orsini's former collaborator, Mr. Frank Marshall.—Athenæum.

The French committee, formed for the purpose of erecting a statue to Berlioz, is headed by M. Ambroise Thomas, the one in Brussels for the same purpose being presided over by M. Gevaert. It is not without interest to note that two directors of Conservatoires should head this tardy recognition of the genius of one who during his life time was excluded from all institutions of the kind. Liszt has contributed 350 francs to the movement.

The Kyrle Society gave Handel's "Messiah" at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on March 21st. Mr. M. L. Lawson conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell, of Sheffield parish church, was the organist on the 17th. The good impression previously made by this artistic and admirable executant was more than confirmed upon this occasion. His first solo was a capital rendering of Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture. A charming work, H. Smart's Con Moto in B flat, came next. Merkel's Sonata, No. 5 in D minor, proved a real treat. The Andante was especially excellent in effect. Barth's Fantasia on a chorale was also admirably played. Balfe's overture "The Bohemian Girl" (perhaps one should add "played by permission" in these days), made a popular termination to a good programme.

Miss Helen D'Alton was in good voice and was received with enthusiasm; she was encored in Handel's "He shall feed His flock," Roeckel's "Faithful" (singing the "Lost Chord" finely in reply), and in Balfe's "Killarney." Yesterday the "Messiah" was performed under Mr. W. G. MacNaught. Mr. W. De Manby Sergison, of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, will be the recitalist this evening, vocal music being given by members of his choir. Miss Theresa Beney, who is a gifted and well prepared lady organist, will give the following organ recital. This talented young lady has already been heard as a recitalist and her performances have met with much favour.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

OPERA IN ENGLISH.

Mr. Carl Rosa will begin his short season of one calendar month on Easter Monday (March 26th) at Drury Lane Theatre. The opera of the opening night is to be a new one in four acts, entitled "Esmeralda," specially written for the Company by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, with Mdme. Georgina Burns in the title-part. Another specimen of "native talents" is also in preparation, namely, "Colombo," a lyrical drama in four acts, written by Dr. Francis Hueffer, and composed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie. "Fidelio" and "The Bohemian Girl" are down for Easter week.

The company of artists includes Mdme. Marie Roze, Mdme. G. Burns, Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. Packard, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Ludwig, and Mr. Snazelle. Mr. Randegger has been chosen as conductor, and it is hoped that Mr. J. D. Maclaren will continue to be acting-manager "in front."

A sneering reference to the works of Wagner appears in a contemporary journal in the form of a hope that Mr. Carl Rosa, having named none of the master's works in his first prospectus, will not perform them this season, or not many! Au contraire: let us have them again and again by all means. "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Der Fliegende Holländer," and "Tristan und Isolde," are all "mounted" at Drury Lane, and all known to the company, at least in their English form. The public have learned to appreciate these noble works; and cynics should be advised to snarl and growl, like their canine "analogues," in some remote backyard, or, as an old wag once suggested, rush into the City to "Tully's Offices," and lock themselves up there!

LINCOLN'S INN CHAPEL.

The works connected with the enlargement and partial re-construction of the chapel of Lincoln's Inn, which have been in progress during the past eighteen months, are at length completed, and the opening services are expected to take place on Sunday, April 8th. The chief features of the renovated building are an extension of 27ft. to the length, an entirely new and handsome roof, and vestries for the clergy and choir over the west entrance.

It is satisfactory to state that the excellent acoustical properties which characterised the old building have been in no way affected by the alterations, save, perhaps, in the direction of improvement.

The organ, which was partly destroyed by the fire at the builder's factory in August last, is in course of erection in its former relative position—on the screen at the west end. The opportunity has been taken to adopt, as far as practicable, the recommendations of the "Organ Conference," and several additions have been made to the scheme of the former instrument. The following is a summary of the stops it now contains:—Great Organ 10 (including a 16ft. open Diapason); Swell, 12; Choir, 7; pedal, 4. Each department of the organ is separate—the Great being on the south side, the Swell on the north, the Choir in front of the screen, and the longer pipes of the pedal organ lying horizontally at the back, the Console being placed behind the Choir organ. This arrangement, it will be seen, is somewhat similar to that of the organ at Westminster Abbey previous to its recent removal.

It may not be generally known that no orders are necessary for admission to the services of this chapel, special accommodation for visitors having been provided in the new portion of the building.

PAGANINI REDIVIVUS.

Although the artist rejoicing in the above title by his ill-judged advertisement anent the great violin concertos of the classical masters invoked adverse criticism, and although the too slavish imitation of a departed virtuoso is not a cause for congratulation in an artistic career which at least claims the dignity of self-respect and manly independence, it is only right and an act of simple justice to acknowledge the eccentric performer's great technical powers as a violinist. On March 20th he gave two recitals in one of the smaller rooms of St. James's Hall, without any accompaniment or extraneous support. His performance consisted of a number of studies in different styles and illustrating different mannerisms, in the execution of which he displayed an extraordinary power over the instrument. His bowing is wonderfully effective, and his double stopping shows a masterly facility and power of expressing distinct parts. His audiences are roused to enthusiasm by his remarkable dexterity, even though the tone produced is at times somewhat lacking in purity. In a notice of this really astonishing executant are the following words:—

"The violinist who is now so widely known to fame under the somewhat mysterious title of Paganini Redivivius, was first heard of at what is called a "Concours," at the Paris Conservatoire, in 1850, when he performed a most difficult solo in the presence of a committee formed of MM. Gounod, Auber, Halèvy, Ambroise Thomas, Clappisson, Félicien David, and Berlioz, in addition to the violin professors, MM. Alard, Dancla, and Massart. His object was to enter some special class for the practice of the bow, for which Paris violin teachers are justly famed. After the trial performance was over, M. Massart came forward and told the violinist that the professors and the committee were of opinion that nature had evidently intended him later on to have a special style of playing of his own, and that there was no professor present who would like to risk taking it upon himself to break him of it. Shortly afterwards, he accepted the place of first violin at Muzard's concerts, at the Hôtel d'Osmond, which site is now occupied by the New Grand Opera House. There the violinists christened him by the familiar name of "Paganini No. 2." Upon one particular occasion while he was going through the rehearsal of a solo piece with the full band accompaniments, an old violin player sprang to his feet and cried out 'Messieurs, Messieurs, c'est Paganini ressuscité; c'est le même son, Messieurs.' In course of time the violinist came to London, where, at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, he drew crowds daily and nightly by a weird and clever impersonation, entitled 'Paganini's Ghost,' which he gave upwards of 200 times in that establishment. Some time afterwards, upon the occasion of Professor Pepper seceding and going to the Egyptian Hall, he took Paganini's Ghost with him, and the entertainment was continued there to delighted audiences for upwards of 300 representations. A well-known London critic commenting upon the performance at the time, observed,—'If our mysterious virtuoso does not wish to put forward his family name, he might at least adopt a cognomen which would not frighten ladies and children. We suggest therefore that the violinist should call himself Paganini Redivivus.' From that time the name was, as it were, created, and has invariably stuck to him ever since."

During the last few years this violinist has played before varied audiences, including many notabilities, musical and otherwise.

THE NAMES OF MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Mr. T. Casson writing to the editor of Musical Opinion, speaks thus of the odd sayings of the American Art Journal with regard to the nomenclature of musical instruments. The writer in the latter journal first infers that "haut-bois" (high wood) refers to the pitch of that wood instrument. I always understood that it referred to the Haut Bois, whence its use is supposed to have originated. Next he informs us that the basset horn is an instrument called a basset, improved by Horn, an instrument maker. Now, with all respect to the ability of this unknown genius, I hardly think that he could improve the bassette, or basset, a diminutive double bass, into a large clarionet. The remarks as to the spelling of "violincello" hardly call for notice The error is of a merely vulgar character, and is practically obsolete; but one fails to understand the objection to "clarionet," or the advantage of using "clarinet." If "clarino," the diminutive of clarion, be admissible with the diminutive "etto" what is the objection to "clarino," with the well-established English diminutive "et," as found in the words "locket," "pocket," "tablet," or even "basset"? "Clarinet" is of no language, unless it be American. The term "horn," and its foreign equivalents, appears to be naturally applied to all wind instruments of tortuous form, and to be by no means especially appropriated to the "familiar brass instrument." The corno di bassetto was formerly known as a "cornet," and other instances immediately occur to me, such as cor Anglais, Krumm horn, Saxe horn, etc.

It is pleasant to record the first orchestral concert given at Trinity College on March 19th. The authorities deserve warm congratulations for their encouragement of the orchestral department of the institution.

Passing Events.

Ponchielli's "Gioconda" is likely to be heard at Covent Garden Theatre this season. The opera was produced in Milan in 1876, and it is stated to have received a semi-private rendering, the performance being organised by Major Wallace Carpenter.

At Mr. Van Noorden's concert on the evening of March 15, he played, with his daughter Emily, a pianoforte duet of Moskowski, "Spanish Dances," and he himself sang John Parry's comic scena "Matrimony." Miss Reba sang Spohr's "Roses softly blooming" with great taste.

At Mr. Von Zastrow's last drawing-room concert, at Glendower House, on Saturday March 17, Mr. Bond-Andrews played several texts of Beethoven, Chopin, and other masters, and Mr. De Wolfe sang classical songs. Both gentlemen distinguished themselves, and evoked much applause.

That excellent association, the Borough of Hackney Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Ebenezer Prout, gave a performance of Schumann's most charming cantata, "Paradise and the Peri," at Shoreditch Town Hall last Monday evening. The soloists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. John Bridson. The chorus and band were complete and very efficient.

Miss J. R. Thomson (Licentiate, R.A.M.) gave a very interesting concert at Southgate on the 1st inst., assisted by Herr Oberthür, and other more or less distinguished artists. Miss Thomson is a pianist of much refinement and culture, and her name being thoroughly familiar as a painstaking, highly successful teacher, not only in her own immediate neighbourhood, but for some miles around, the large and appreciative audience that assembled was both a just tribute to the high order of her talent as an executant, and an agreeable proof of the thoroughly-deserved respect which her conscientious efforts among her numerous pupils have inspired.

The pupils of the Royal Irish Academy gave a choir concert on the 14th inst., when "Judas Maccabeus" was performed. The choir is making marked progress under the directorhip of the Cavalier Giuseppe Bozzelli, whose method of teaching appears to prove fruitful within a short time. The band, considering the limited number of performers, was effective, and the choruses were well given. The duet for soprano and contralto "O Lovely Peace," secured the performing pupils the success of the evening, and coming at the close of the oratorio sent the large audience away with pleasant memories of the performance.

The North-East London Choral Society gave its second concert of the season at the Morley Hall, Hackney, on Tuesday evening, March 13th. As an opening, Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 1, was played by Mr. John E. West, A.C.O., which was followed by Gade's cantata, "The Erl King's Daughter," by the choir, the solo parts being sustained by Mdme. Clara West, Miss Coyte Turner, and Mr. Charles Prickett. The second part of the programme consisted of ballads, part-songs, etc. Miss Clara Wollaston, Miss Lottie West, and Mr. Sinclair Dunn, in addition to the before-mentioned soloists, contributed, and were mostly encored. Mr. L. B. Prout and Mr. W. West were the accompanists, and Mr. John E. West was conductor. The audience was large and appreciative.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.—Mr. H. Lawrence Harris, secretary of the Music Publishers' Association, writes to acquaint the public of the fact that the multiplying copies, by any means whatever, of copyright music or other works, without the sanction of the owner of the copyright, is a breach of the Copyright Acts, and adds: "The Music Publishers' Association has recently been compelled to take proceedings against one lady, and to threaten proceedings against another, in respect of this very offence, and has only consented to stay further proceedings on an ample apology and payment of costs being made. In the case of similiar infringements of the publishers' rights being hereafter brought to light, the offenders must expect less lenient treatment."

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

Schumann was not only a great composer, but also a man of great literary attainments, and, in order to educate the public to a due appreciation of his works, as well as to strike a blow at the light Italian school of music, he, together with Wieck and others, edited the New Musical Journal, the organ of a more poetical school, versus the superficial party, whose ears were too easily tickled with a luscious cadenza, a languishing appoggiatura, or a rapid run from one end of the scale to the other. He says, "now-a-days we must have ideas, and those ideas well carried out. We must have poetical conception; everything must bear the impress of imagination, else the effect is merely momentary." Since his death, however, the intrinsic merit of his compositions has done far more for their acceptance with the public than all the literary efforts of his lifetime. His Symphony in C was sketched during a period of great mental and physical suffering. The date is 1846, and in ten years from this his sufferings were ended by his untimely death. Traces of mental conflict are evident in this noble composition, and the hymn of thanksgiving at the end is a touching proof that, at least for the time, the composer had triumphed over his affliction. The work is, of course, well known to the Crystal Palace orchestra, and with the exception of a little unsteadiness—for a few bars only—in the lovely scherzo, the performance was all that could be desired.

Señor Sarasate again met with a most cordial reception, and played Wieniawski's concerto with marked success. The work, which is full of interest, was composed especially for Señor Sarasate, and with a perfect knowledge of his great abilities; it may therefore be imagined how well the great violinist availed himself of every point, and how perfectly he acquitted himself in every movement. We are told that Wieniawski died in extreme poverty in one of the hospitals of Moscow, in 1880. But why one of the greatest violinists of our age, and one who could write such a concerto as this, was allowed to die in such a wretched manner, it is hard to understand; for, happily, genius and poverty are not so closely allied as they formerly were. The other solos for the violin were of course charmingly played, and a double recall induced the great violinist to give the audience one of Chopin's lovely cantabile pieces.

It is erroneously stated in the Crystal Palace programme that Mendelssohn's overture, "Meerestille und Glückliche Fahrt," was last performed at the Saturday concerts on April 5th 1879. I should not have noticed this error did it not recall to mind the fact that, some twelve months ago it was played here, when an awkward accident—the flute failing to take up the tiny flourish at the end of the adagio—compelled the conductor to begin the overture again. An accident of this kind is so rare at these concerts, that it can hardly fail to be remembered.

Mdme. Rose Hersee was by no means happy in her interpretation of Mozart's song, but in Weber's Arietta she was more successful.

Mr. W. S. Hoyte gives a recital on the Wareham organ at the factory of Messrs. Maley, Young and Oldknow, on Monday next, April 9th, and Mr. E. H. Turpin will play on the following evening, Tuesday, April 10th.

SIGNOR CASANO'S SERIAL CHAMBER CONCERTS.

At the sixth soirée, on March 29th, Miss E. Casano, daughter of the Principal of the "West London College of Music," in Colville Gardens, played Liszt's piece, "La Regatta Veneziana" (at the outset) in excellent style. She is a pupil of Mdme. Voarino, and does her mistress credit. Miss K. Thompson, a young lady with a high resonant soprano voice, sang Millard's "Waiting." In the absence of another vocalist, Miss A. Woods, a pupil of the institution, kindly sang Rossini's air in A, "Bel raggio lusinghiere," from "Semiramide;" "Le Rossignol" of Ciardi, and the air from Auber's "L'Ambassadrice," in B flat, "Jusqu'a lui." Miss Wood has a high, florid, and flexible voice. She sang up to high A and B flat, and shook like a bird. Mrs. Turrill gave a splendid version of "Robert, toi que j'aime." Mr. C. Oberthür played two of his own harp solos with éclat, and Captain E. Acklom gave a recitation. Mr. Probert, a professional artist, sang airs of Sir Sterndale Bennett and Tours. Signor Casano conducted the concert, and afterwards entertained his friends in hospitable fashion.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY AT DRURY LANE.

Beethoven's "Fidelio" on Thursday, March 29th, served to introduce a Leonora new to Londoners (only) in the person of the charming Parisian prima donna, Mdme. Marie Roze, who has recently sustained this arduous part in the provincial towns of England with remarkable success. It is thought, and the printed opinions of critics might be quoted to this effect, that Mdme. Roze's impersonation of the faithful wife, whilst exquisitely tender, pathetic, and feminine, hardly attains the requisite power of high tragedy. Leonora must be gentle and loving to her husband, no doubt; but when she at last confronts the vile assassin, Pizarro, in the startling pistol situation, it is almost necessary, as Shakespeare makes Richmond say in "Richard III.," to assume the furious wrath of the tigress robbed of her whelps. Schroeder-Devrient, and afterwards Theresa Titiens, rose to this towering height of passion. The latter used to rush at Pizarro like one of the gallant guards at the last charge ("Up Guards and at 'em") on the plains of Waterloo; and her scream shook the theatre. This tremendous situation—the finest known on the lyrical stage, ought really to end the opera, for all the rest, in comparison, seems anti-climax. Mdme. Marie Roze's sex, as contemporaries remark, could never have been mistaken in real life: she is the gentle woman throughout; but her action is always interesting, and her little bits of by-play are instinct with genius. In the scena of Act I, a lack of power was manifest. Bouquets were freely thrown down, after the falls of the curtain. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh were present.

A good all-round performance was this of March 29th, no undue prominence of any particular feature, but the canvas, so to speak, even and homogeneous. The general stage movements, however, would not quite satisfy the requirements of old Mr. Turveydrop; a little acting manager's drill might be advisable, and in "Esmeralda" it has been noticed that the chorus crowd upon the "principals" in very unseemly fashion. Mr. F. C. Packard made a fair Florestan, and a new basso, Mr. Franco Novaro appeared as Rocco, the Gaoler; he has a fine and penetrating voice. Miss C. Perry and Miss B. Davies, filled the minor parts of Marcellina and Jaquino. The Canon in G is now hardly ever encored.

The remarks on "Esmeralda" respecting certain Wagnerian tendencies are confirmed by contemporaries; that is to say, the composer rarely "pulls up" at full stop, as in the artificially set conventional opera; the style is pronounced to be modern French, and the scoring very excellent.

On Tuesday evening, "Il Trovatore," a very old and favourite opera, once more introduced Mdme. Valleria, a remarkably fine artist, who in addition to many other high qualifications, has personified, to the admiration of all vrais connoisseurs, the Senta of Wagner, in that marvellous opera of marine painting, "Der Fliegende Holländer."

As the commemorative anniversary of Washington Irving is about to be celebrated in the United States, it may be noticed, en passant, that the eminent American author in his "Bracebridge Hall," has made use of the legend in an episode entitled "The Storm Ship."

"Il Trovatore" was first heard by the British public in 1856, at the Lyceum Theatre, then the temporary refuge of the Italian Opera, after the conflagration of the large house in Bow Street, Covent Garden, in February of the same year, suspected to have been the act of an incendiary, actuated by inimical feeling against a speculative aeronaut, whom the late Mr. Gye had, most unfortunstely, allowed to occupy the theatre before the regular opera season, and to give on this memorable night a bal masqué.

A prima donna of highest celebrity, Mdme. Bosio, sustained the part of Leonora at the Lyceum in 1856, and the writer has not forgotten her voice or her stage action.

The performance at Drury Lane on Tuesday was excellent. Mdme. Valleria, whom the part well suits, sang and acted with much power. Miss Josephine Yorke ranted a little too much as Azucena, and so incurred a risk of crossing the line which divides deep tragedy from comic business. "Stride la vampa" was decidedly over done. Mr. Packard, a fair Manrico, would have been better if his intonation had been more precise. In the ari "desarto sulla terra," he was a little uncertain. Mr. Leslie Crotty, the Comte di Luna, excelled, and evoked much applause for "Il balen del suo sorriso." The band and chorus played and sang admirably.

On Monday, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's lyrical drama in four acts, "Colomba," is to be produced. The libretto has been written by Dr. Francis Hueffer, the able musical reporter of The Times. The leading parts by Mdme. Valleria and Mr. Barton MacGuckin.

CHELTENHAM.

At the fourth grand concert held at the Assembly Rooms of this town, Miss Alice Roselli won an encore for the new ballad of Milton Willing's "Forgive and forget," and evoked much applause in Roeckel's song, "Lord Mayor Whittington," the words whereof may be objected to as childish nursery twaddle, unworthy of the subject. Gounod's religious air, "Noël," was also admirably rendered by Miss Roselli. Signor Villa sang "Pro peccatis" from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with force and dignity, and Fauré's "Les Rameaux," and he created a sensation in Churchill Sibley's song, "The Bell of St. Paul's." It is to be hoped that the great Bell in E flat will utter a more edifying sentiment than the halting verse of the poetaster, to the effect that "Time is King." Sad and silly moral for the campana of a Christian Cathedral! Mdme. Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Maas, and other favourite artists, sang in the course of the soirée. Mr. F. Cliffe and Mr. T. Lawson played Grieg's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin; and Mr. Cliffe pianoforte solos by Grieg and Watson.

THE HUNGARIAN CONCERT.

A concert in aid of the recent inundations in Hungary, held at St. James's Hall, on Saturday evening, March 31st, did not attract an overflowing audience, notwithstanding strong attractions. The public are too much pestered by philanthropists now-a-days; and naturally slack to put their hard-earned pence in the too frequently presented begging-box, at church and elsewhere. Mr. J. B. Poznanski was engaged as violinist, and played Paganini's piece in D, "La Danse des Sorcières" (The Witches' Dance) with great éclat. A short introduction leads to a tremolo, "sul ponticello"; a larghetto follows, with shake on A; and then comes an andantino con variazioni, where the violin takes a wider range, with plenty of double stopping in thirds, sixths, and octaves. An elaborate cadenza closes the dance. Mr. Poznanski is a great adept at harmonics, both natural and artificial; and whatever may be thought of this difficult accomplishment in an æsthetic, or musical sense, the feat at least serves to illustrate the mathematical principles of acoustics, as applicable to string instruments. Signor Mattei played his own pretty pianoforte solos, "L'Elégante," and "Galop de Concert." Mdme. Edith Wynne and Mdme. Liebhardt sang. Mr. W. Ganz conducted the concert.

WATFORD.

The second and third parts of Handel's "Messiah" were sung by the Church Oratorio Society at Oxhey Church on March 28th. The soloists included the Misses A. Brook and Barker, and Mr. C. Healey. Mr. J. Farmer of Harrow, conducted, and Mr. James Turpin, Mus.Bac., was the organist. The music was effectively and carefully performed.

HOLBORN TOWN HALL.

Mr. J. T. Hutchinson gave what may be called his annual concert at the Holborn Town Hall on April 5th. Mr. Hutchinson is not only widely esteemed as an artistic bass-baritone, but he has a large circle of personal friends who look forward with pleasure to his concerts. The work chosen this time was Haydn's "Creation." The chief singers were Miss Agnes Larkcom whose powers and acquirements are so well recognised, Mr. Henry Guy the well known tenor, and the concert-giver himself, whose finished singing could hardly be heard to better advantage than in the "Creation." Mr. McNaught was the experienced and excellent conductor; the organ was in the very competent hands of Mr. Harvey Löhr, and a number of well selected strings aided in the performance. It is only to be regretted that the platform arrangements at the Holborn Town Hall are so miserably inadequate as to make a full orchestra and ample chorus impossible, for in this way Mr. Hutchinson's hands must be unfortunately tied down; and his concerts would otherwise have doubtless assumed still larger and more interesting proportions. He is any way to be congratulated upon his efforts and upon his own excellent personal performances.

St. Peter's, Leigham Court Road, Streatham, S.W.—On Easter Day, Schubert's mass in G was sung at this church, an efficient orchestra being employed. Mr. B. Agutter, Mus.Bac., F.C.O., conducted, Mr. C. Ersfield was leader, Mr. E. J. Quance was at the organ. Mr. Agutter's Sequence "To the Paschal Victim" was scored for this occasion, a special feature being the harp obbligato.

Calderbrook.—The new, small, but sweet-toned organ built for St. James's Church by Messrs. Booth and Hepworth at the cost of £250, was recently opened by Mr. T. W. Pilling, of Bolton and Mirfield. At the conclusion of a special service that gentleman played in a masterly manner Slow movement (Merkel), Andante (G. Herman), Introduction and Offertoire (Hewlett), Pastorale (Merkel), Grand Chœur (Salomé), and andante (Boyton Smith).

Torquay.—Mr. T. Craddock, Bac.Mus., Oxon, has just completed a series of organ recitals on the very fine organ in Upton Church, Torquay, having given the six organ sonatas of Mendelssohn in rotation, besides one of Bach's fugues at each recital, and other pieces by Handel (the concertos), Saint-Saens, Kullak, Mozart, etc. The recitals having been so much appreciated, Mr. Craddock intends giving weekly performances until Whitsuntide.

Alton, Hants.—A performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given, under the able direction of Mr. C. G. Halliday, at the Assembly Rooms on the 29th ult. The soloists were Mdme. Helen M. Stark and Mr. C. E. Pillow, of Chichester Cathedral; and Mr. H. Walmsley Little, Mus.Bac., presided at the pianoforte. The second part of the programme consisted of a selection from the "Messiah," with orchestral accompaniments, the band and chorus numbering eighty performers.

Surrey County School of Music.—At the "musical evening" on Wednesday, March 28th, an organ recital was given by Mr. Frank Bradley, who performed a selection from the works of Bach, Raff, Lemmens, Widar, Kuhmstedt, Salomé, etc., to the satisfaction of a numerous audience. The programme also included vocal music, rendered by professional students of the school, whose efforts it would perhaps be scarcely fair to criticise while they are yet in statu pupillari. Similar entertainments are announced for April 11th and 18th.

Bocconoc Church.—On March 27th, the new organ was opened at a special service in the evening, when a very large congregation assembled. Previous to the service Mr. John Hele, junr., of St. Peter's, Plymouth, gave a recital of classical music, much to the gratification of those present. The instrument, which was built by Messrs. Hele and Co., of Plymouth, by order of Lady Fortescue, is well suited to the church, and has been well spoken of. It contains, in the great organ.—1, open diapason; 2, stopped diapason; 3, dulciana; 4, flute; 5, principal; 6, piccolo. Swell organ.—1, open diapason; 2, gedact; 3, violin diapason; 4, gemshorn; 5, cornopean. Pedal organ.—1, bourdon. Couplers.—1, swell to great; 2, swell to pedal; 3, great to pedal.

ROYAL VICTORIA COFFEE HALL, S.E.—The military concert given at the above hall by Lieut.-Col. Keyser and the officers of the 7th Royal Fusiliers, on March 29th, was a great uccess. Colonel Keyser took the chair, and by his charming sconviviality kept the whole concert going in an exceptionally brilliant manner. He introduced Major Brook Mears as the "great gun" of the evening, and he certainly did bring down the house. Where all did their parts so efficiently it would be invidious for speciel praise, but one cannot pass over Lieutenant W. H. Heron Maxwell and Lieutenant H. G. Dunning, who were real "comiques," and can only be superseded by Colonel Keyser's own acting and singing. The programme for April includes a ballad concert given by Mdme. Enequist, and a miscellaneous concert in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music, which will be attended by H.R.H. the Princess Christian.

REDRUTH.—Mr. T. J. Thuell's annual concert was given on March 27th, with an interesting selection of vocal and orchestral music, including solos for violin by Mr. Hallett, English concertina by Alsepti, an elderly blind man handling the not very tractable instrument with singular skill, cornet by Mr. T. Vincent, and clarionet by Mr. Hallett. The orchestral pieces included "The Wedding March" (Mendelssohn), and andante "Surprise Symphony" (Haydn). The vocal portions of the programme consisted of songs by Miss Lemin (organist of Redruth Church), "Dream Faces" (encored and partially repeated), and "A Mother's Story"; "The Vale of years" (composed by Mr. Thuell), by Mr. E. A. Uglow, of Falmouth; an Italian song, and another, by Signor Tito Beccarini, of Falmouth; a double quartet "The Haymakers," and a chorus from "Patience" by Sullivan.

LEEDS.—The second of the borough organist's "Hours with the Great Composers" took place on March 24th, when there was even a larger audience than on the Handel night, thus unmistakably showing to what an extent the love of John Sebastian Bach's erudite compositions has reached with the people generally. The programme was full of interest and variety, and it included the ever-welcome fugue, with an extemporaneous introduction by the executant, on St. Ann's Tune, two bourrées of the real Bach type; "The Giant" fugue in D minor, with another extemporaneous introduction, the beautiful air, "My heart ever faithful," which secured a rapturous encore; a fine concerto in three movements in G (an arrangement by Bach of one of the concertos by Vivaldi) bright and tuneful as Handel himself; and finally the famous "Toccata" in F major, in which there is a pedal solo of surpassing dignity, and withal difficult. Dr. Spark seemed to have his heart thoroughly in the work, and the whole performance was a great success.—Yorkshire Post.

DUBLIN GLEE CHOIR.—The large attendance at, and eulogistic notices of the inaugural concert of the second season of the above society is the best assurance of the want that was long felt having been well supplied through the exertions of Mr. Arthur Patton. I am really at a loss to select any particular item of the programme as meriting especial praise, where everything was excellently done. The part-songs, madrigals, and glees performed by the choir embraced the work of a large number of well known contemporary composers, as well as two by De Pearsall, namely the ballet madrigal "Shoot, false love," and "Allan a Dale," and a madrigal by Luca Marenzio (1570). Mrs. Hutchinson sang an Italian recitative and aria and two German songs, one by Brahms, the other by Grieg, with remarkable success. Signor Esposito, of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, justified the assertions that have been freely circulated in musical circles here respecting his exceptional ability as a pianist. He played the "Moonlight" sonata, a nocturne and allegretto of his own and Schubert-Tausig's "Marche Militaire."

CLEVEDON CHORAL SOCIETY.—This flourishing society gave a grand evening concert on March 28th, at the Public Hall, before a large audience. Valuable aid was rendered on this occasion by an efficient band, in which Mr. A. Price took the various "wind" parts with great skill upon the harmonium, Mr. Walter Somerton being equally successful with the organ parts on a second harmonium. The concert may be pronounced a success. The first work undertaken was Mendelssohn's somewhat formidable "Hymn of Praise." The opening symphony, by the band, demonstrated at once their ability, and its performance left but little to be desired. The choruses were throughout rendered in such a manner as to reflect great credit upon the class and their teacher and conductor, Mr. H. E. Marchant. The solos were taken by Miss F. Visgar, whose charming voice was heard to advantage, and Mr. A. B. Trestrail, who also sang a duet with Miss Visgar. That lady also sang with Miss Maxwell, but through an expressed desire on the programme the audience restrained their temptation to applaud during the performance of the piece. The second part comprised a work of an entirely different character—Cumming's "Fairy Ring." Many of the airs are exceedingly pretty; those rendered by Miss Maxwell and Mr. J. Hudson being particularly deserving of commendation, and the work is an artistic production well deserving a large popularity. Mr. Talbot's solos were also appreciated. The choruses again went well, with effective instrumentation by the band, and the audience was not slow to mark its approval by repeated applause.

CIRENCESTER.—The annual concert of the Cirencester Choral Society was held at the Corn Hall on March 29th, when the spacious building was well filled. The works which, after careful and studied preparation throughout the season, were selected for performance were Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Lizzie Hellis, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Thomas Woodward. Mr. Brind, the conductor, was accorded a hearty reception, both from the members of his class (with whom he is very popular) and the audience. The first part consisted of the "Last Judgment," and from the overture to the closing chorus it went excellently. The "Hymn of Praise" was given with equal success to that which attended the former production. Perhaps one of the most admired numbers was the duet, "I waited for the Lord," by Miss Jones and Miss Hellis, which was indeed charmingly sung, and the chorus that followed, "O blessed are they that hope," was a complete success. The recitative, "We called" (Mr. Kenningham and Miss Jones), and the chorus, "The night is departing," were finely executed, and the closing choruses were sung with great spirit.

ST. ALBANS.—On Thursday, March 29th, an enjoyable amateur concert was given at the Town Hall, under the patronage of Viscountess Grimston, Mrs. Lawrence, the Mayoress of St. Albans, and other influential ladies in the city and neighbourhood. The programme opened with a pianoforte duet, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn), played in a finished style by Lady Harriet Grimston and Miss Mabel Williams. Miss Alice Brooks, so well known in the county by her efforts on behalf of the School of Music at the Watford Public Library, and also as a vocalist, sang "Diva" (Visetti); she also sang with exquisite taste "Although a cloud o'erspread the heaven" ("Der Freischütz"), and was encored, when she again pleased her audience by a perfect rendering of "A bird sang in a hawthorn tree." Miss Brooks and Mr. Ernest Hensley sang Marzial's pretty duet, "Friendship," with a touch of true artistic merit. Mrs. Cowper Cooper sang several times during the evening, and much pleased the audience with Cowen's beautiful song, "Regret." Mr. Ernest Hensley was heard to advantage in "The Old Brigade," and better still in the encore it called forth, viz., "My Love is come," by Theo. Marzials. Mr. Webster, who was well received, played a violin solo, Sonata in G (Handel) in a masterly style, and also sang with good effect Molloy's "Three merry men are we." The same gentleman's fine bass voice excelled itself in Rossini's "Largo al factotum." The name of Mr. J. Maude Crament (Mus.Bac., Oxon), is sufficient guarantee that the accompaniments were ably played, if at times a trifle loud. The entire arrangements for the concert were undertaken by the Viscountess Grimston and Mr. Henry Toulmin, and they are to be heartily congratulated on the results of their labours.

SHERBORNE.—The concert given by the Sherborne School Musical Society on Easter Monday, the anniversary of Beethoven's death, was highly deserving of earnest praise for (says our Sherborne correspondent) it was really the finest of the many extremely good concerts given by this society. The great school-room was filled with a discriminating audience, and the scholars were seated in a gallery raised for the occasion. The orchestra was unquestionably the finest that has been heard in this part of the country. Mr. Louis N. Parker, the society's conductor, was in his usual place. The programme opened with the Easter hymn, "Jesus Christ is risen to-day, Allelulia." This was introduced by the trumpet, and sung by the choir and audience with grand effect. Beethoven's Symphony in C major (No. 1), Op. 22, was next performed, and it was selected for this occasion in honour of Beethoven's memory. All the most popular numbers from Handel's "Messiah" (with Mozart's additional accompaniments) comprised the next part of the programme. The solos were sung by Stuart, Penny, Sayres Bennett, Lewis, and Mr. R. S. Ainslie. The choruses went admirably, notwithstanding a slight weakness noticeable in the tenors. The next and concluding number was Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll." This is a unique specimen of Wagner's music; in the first place it is, with the exception of a juvenile symphony, and two or three marches written for special occasions, the only piece of abstract orchestral music written by him; in the second place, the means employed are of the simplest nature, the orchestra only consists of one flute, one hautboy, two clarinets, one bassoon, two horns, one trumpet, and the usual complement of strings. To Mr. L. N. Parker, the able and enthusiastic conductor, and to Mr. Regan, the instructor of the amateur element of the orchestra, the highest praise is due for the great success of this the seventy-first concert of the Society.

BATH.—At St. Mary's, Bathwick, on Good Friday, a large congregation assembled, when the Passion Music of Gounod's "Redemption" was sung for the Three Hours' Service." To many possibly the work may appear in some respects crude and over-wrought, and not sufficiently relieved by by flowing melodies, as in the case of other oratorios, but it must be borne in mind that the thrilling incidents are all eminently dramatic, and that the composer has throughout manifestly approached his theme with an earnest feeling for its sacred character. Instances of the realistic portions are—the Condemnation, the going to Calvary, the Crucifixion, Mary at the foot of the Cross, the episode of the two Thieves, and the death of Jesus, the music consisting principally of a very plain style of recitative, a tempo, accompanied by subtle harmony, of simple song, generally even measured sounds which may almost be described as earnest speech in musical effect, of purely dramatic chorus, and of independent orchestral music. Whatever objection may be taken to the treatment of these passages, praise must be given to the points where the realistic attitude gives way to the poetic in the choruses, "Forth the Royal Banners go," "The Reproaches," "Beside the Cross," with the solo "While my watch," and the chorale "Lord Jesus." All of these are compositions of that rank to which only lofty genius can attain. Clear in form, chaste in melody, graphic in harmony, and deep with moral import, "The Reproaches," and "Beside the Cross," are particularly impressive. The several solos, choruses and chorales, were rendered with a precision and finish truly surprising, when we consider the small number of executants, notably the chorus of mockers and derisive chorus of priests, wherein the taunting crowd was graphically depicted. "The Reproaches," the quartet and chorus, "Beside the Cross," and the chorales. "While her watch she is keeping"—the contralto air having been first pathetically given by one of the boy choristers—and "Lord Jesus, thou to all bringest light and salvation," which is full of deep feeling, were impressively sung. Mr. Arthur Huff adroitly sustained the solo voices, while giving ample support and effect to the full choruses. His masterly execution of the "March to Calvary," and of the graphic descriptive movement representing the darkness was intensely realistic, and both himself and choir are to be congratulated on the success which attended their efforts and crowned the labour bestowed on the preparation of the work.

NORTHAMPTON.—The Northampton Choral Society gave their third public performance this season on Thursday evening, March 29th, at the Exchange Hall, which was nearly filled by an appreciative audience. Macfarren's cantata, "The Lady of the Lake," was selected for performance, and though the venture of attempting such a comparatively unknown and difficult work was great, the success which attended its interpretation justified the choice. To say that it was perfectly rendered would not be correct, the hoarseness of Mr. Frederick King, from whom so much had been expected, and the hitch which followed FitzJames's defiance in the 17th number, being sufficient to prevent the attainment of such a desirable result, but notwithstanding these disadvantages the performance was an extremely gratifying one, and reflective of great credit on the talented and painstaking conductor (Mr. Brook Sampson), the soloists, the chorus, and orchestra. The principal artists were Miss and Miss F. Robertson, soprano and contralto; Mr. Sydney Towers, tenor; Mr. F. King and Mr. A. W. Warren, basses; Mr. J. H. Twinn, leader of the band; Mr. R. W. Strickland, pianist; Miss Annie Lea and Miss L. Gray (pupils of Mr. Brook Sampson), harpists; and Mr. Twist, principal second violin. The band and chorus comprised upwards of 200 performers, and the tout ensemble of the whole (occupying for the first time the new orchestra erected for the directors of the Corn Exchange Company) was striking and impressive. One of the soloists was Mr. A. W. Warren, of Northampton. He was allotted the two minor characters of James, Earl of Douglas, and John of Brent. In the music set down for the latter he was most successful, his rendering of the rollicking soldier's song—"Our Vicar still preaches that Peter and Paul laid a swinging long curse on the bonny brown bowl"—being loudly re-demanded. Of Miss Robertson, as Ellen, and Miss F. Robertson, as Malcolm Græme and Blanche of Devan, nothing but praise can be spoken. The choruses which proved the greatest favourites were, "Hail to the Chief" (essentially Scottish in character), the description of Fitzjames's pursuit of Murdock, and the funeral song, "He is gone on the mountain," which was rendered with due solemnity and impressiveness, and which the audience compelled to be repeated. The effect of the concluding chorus was considerably marred by the disturbance made by a number of persons leaving the hall. Mr. Brook Sampson must be congratulated upon the proficiency which the members of the society have acquired during the two seasons that he has been their conductor. It is gratifying to find Professor Macfarren's fine and picturesque work gaining a well-deserved public appreciation in different directions.

On Good Friday Evening "The Messiah" was given at Victoria Park Congregational Church, capable of seating two thousand persons. The performance was under the direction of Mr. W. West, who also presided at the organ. The principal soloists were Mdme. Clara West, Miss C. Wollaston, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. C. Prickett. The choir consisted of 100 voices, and there was an efficient band, led by Mr. Lewis, of the Crystal Palace. Trumpet obbligato, Mr. Davin; conductor, Mr. John E. West. There was a good attendance, and the performance was admirable throughout.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

PARIS, March 31st, 1883.

Should Art be national or universal? The question is asked here frequently in various ways, and answered variously, as the mood of the critics or the public may dictate. At present it is being mooted again, apropos of the journey of M. Vaucorbeil to Italy. The Manager of the Opera (who, it may be remarked in passing, has proved a bitter disappointment as a manager) has been away in Genoa, and the rumour runs that he has undertaken his journey for the sake of getting Verdi's consent to the production of his new work, "Iago," at the Opera. This has given rise to a storm of what I fear is not altogether disinterested "patriotic" indignation, and all the critics who have works of their own, or whose friends have works, waiting for a hearing, are excitedly enquiring whether it was for this M. Vaucorbeil had been drawing his 800,000 francs of subsidy yearly; and profess to be greatly scandalized at the notion of the composer of "Trovatore" being preferred to M. Salvayre and to the inevitable M. Massenet. The same commotion, I remember, was caused by the revival of "Aïda" soon after M. Vaucorbeil assumed the managerial reins some years ago. The same commotion would, I doubt not, be created were "Armide," or "Iphigenie en Aulide," or "Lohengrin," to be put upon the stage, in accordance with the promises made by the present manager of the Opéra at a time when (as a Paris chroniqueur unfeelingly puts it), "having failed to make his mark as a composer," he began to hunger for the emoluments and honour attaching to the post he has since obtained. In this matter, however, M. Vaucorbeil is more enlightened than his critics, and more liberal. The Opéra was not built, at enormous expense, for a few French composers of uncertain merit, but for the whole French people. So that the public is given the best procurable music, with the best possible interpretation, no one has the slightest right to grumble; and if it so happens that M. Vaucorbeil has reason to suppose Verdi's "Iago" is likely to be more interesting than M. Massenet's "Montalto," or M. Reyer's "Sigurd," why, so much the worse for MM. Massenet and Reyer. The young composer of "Le roi de Lahore," has had the sense to see the reasonableness of this himself. He has gracefully consented to waive his turn, and make way for some other aspirant to success at the Opéra. His "Montalto" is not ready, nor will it be, I expect, for at least a year to come. In any case, it can wait far better than "Iago" could if it were ready. But "Iago," too, is far from finished, unless my Milan correspondent is much mistaken, for Verdi has been devoting great part of his time lately to the revising of "Don Carlos," and, though he had at least planned out his new Shakesperian opera three years ago, he has not been able to terminate it. Besides, when it is is finished, it will be first produced—not at the Paris Opéra, but at the Scala. The wrath of the Parisians is therefore decidedly premature, nor does it seem at all fair to M. Vaucorbeil—at the very moment, too, when (yielding, it is said, to the very strong pressure put upon him) he has just put M. Saint-Säens' "Henri VIII." on the stage.

This opera, by-the-bye, "goes" much better than it did, now that it has been lightened by the excision of a whole tableau in the third act, and modified in various other ways. The oftener it is heard, the more the beauties and ingenuities of the orchestration grow upon one; and though I am still of opinion that the work does not hang together or satisfy one as a whole, dramatically or musically, I cannot deny that it has made a more favourable impression on the public than could have been anticipated from the reception given it the first night.

M. Charles Gounod contributes an interesting article on M. Saint-Säens and "Henri VIII." to the current number of La Nouvelle Revue (dated 1st of April). The composer of "Faust" informs us that he had always known M. Saint-Säens would grow famous. He has, according to M. Gounod, one of the most astonishing musical organisations one could meet; knows all the great masters by heart (a doubtful compliment, this!) and has a prodigious power of assimilation (a still more doubtful compliment). "He could, if he wished, write a work after the manner of Rossini, Schumann, or Wagner. He knows them all by heart—the surest way, perhaps, to avoid imitating any of them. He is not distressed by fear of failing to produce his effects (a terrible anguish for the pusillanimous). He never exaggerates; so he is neither tricky, nor violent, nor emphatic. (N.B.—This seems to be aimed at M. Massenet, but it might be meditated on with profit by a good many other composers). . . . . He is neither pedantic, nor solemn, nor transcendental. He has remained too childlike, and become too skilful to be either. He has no particular system; belongs to no party, no clique; does not set up for being a reformer of anything whatever; and he writes as what he feels and knows prompts him. Mozart did not reform anything; yet for all that I believe he stood at the summit of his art . . ."

The conclusion of the article is thoroughly and heartily eulogistic:—

"So now, my dear Saint-Saëns, your name is attached to one of the works which have done most honour to French art and our National Academy of Music. To those who knew you as a child (I am of the number) your destiny was certain. You had a musical childhood: unwearingly watched over by your intelligent and generous mother, you had the great masters of the art for your foster-fathers. They made you robust and strong to pursue your course. Fame had long gone before you, and prepared the way for the popularity which the stage seems exclusively privileged to bestow. All that you lacked to complete your prestige was one brilliant dramatic success; and now you have that, go on, then, dear and great musician. Your course is victorious all along the line. Inasmuch as you have been faithful to your art, the future shall be faithful to your work. God has given you light, and a master hand. May He preserve them long to you, both for your sake and for ours."

P.S.—April 1st. M. Albert Caher's mythological cantata, "Endymion," was given for the first time to-day, with fair success, at the Cirque d'Hiver, under the personal direction of the composer. I shall return to this in my next letter. At to-day's Châtelet concert, M. Colonne gave us an astounding programme, including the following works:—

"Manfred" (Poème dramatique de Lord Byron).... Schumann.
"L'Arlesienne," musique pour le drame d'Alphonse Daudet ..... G. Bizet.
1. Prélude—2. Minuetto—3. Adagietto—4. Carillon.
Marche Funèbre, pour la dernière scène "d'Hamlet" Berlioz.
"Béatrice et Bénédict" (Duo)..... Berlioz.
"Roméo et Juliette"..... Berlioz.

The Châtelet campaign will be brought to a brilliant close next Sunday with Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

C. Harry Meltzer.

Gounod's Redemption" has been given in Hamburg.

Boito's "Mefistofele" has much pleased the people of Stockholm.

"Le Trésor," a new opera, music by M. Lefebure, recently scored a success at Angers.

The death is announced of Wagner's sister, Attilie, widow of Herr Hermann Brockhaus, of Leipzig.

Verdi's early opera, "La Force du Destin," is said to have entirely failed on its recent revival at Antwerp.

The Rossini prize of 3000 francs for the best opera libretto has been awarded to M. Georges Bayer, editor of the Paris Figaro, who was one of 169 competitors.

On Good Friday the "Société des Concerts," in connection with the Paris Conservatoire, gave a very fine performance of the "Enfance du Christ," by Berlioz. M. Guilmant presided at the organ.

An oratorio by M. Adolphe Deslandres, "Les Sept Paroles du Christ," was performed at Versailles lately, under the composer's direction, and also at Limoges, being well received in both places.

Owing to the enforced absence of Mr. Humphrey Stark, Mus.Bac., at the concert given on Friday last, at Gresham Hall, Brixton, Mr. Frank Bradley presided at the grand pianoforte, and accompanied Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," besides playing a piano solo, Schumann's "Novelletten," and also the accompaniments to the miscellaneous selection.

THE POSITION OF THE CHOIR AND ORGANS IN CHURCHES.*

The importance of music as an accompaniment to the service of the Almighty has been acknowledged in every age and by every form of religious worship with which history has made us acquainted; and to realise the extraordinary attention which this branch of sacred art received at the hands of the people of old, we have only to open the Holy Scriptures and read the account given in the Second Book of Chronicles of the dedication of Solomon's Temple, in which we are told that there were present, amongst others, "the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets." In the earliest days of Christianity we also read of "singing hymns," and all through the Middle Ages the same importance continued to be given to music in connexion with the services of the Church. Charlemagne, who, we should have thought, had quite enough business upon his hands to occupy all his time, yet considered it his duty to become acquainted with the discussions going on as to the correct number of the Gregorian "modes" or tones to be used in church music; and Robert, king of France, absolutely conducted the choir of his royal chapel, arrayed in his coronation robes!

Although the Eastern Church also cultivated music, yet there was a great divergence of practice; the Western Church admitting the use of instrumental accompaniment, and the Eastern Church strictly prohibiting it. However, it should be noted that the use of instrumental accompaniments is not, and never was, universal even in the West, and it is a well-known fact that neither organ nor orchestra has ever been admitted into the Pope's own chapel, the Sistine, nothing but pure vocal music being allowed. I believe also that the Cistercian and several other religious orders are forbidden by their rules to have anything but vocal music in their churches. Until some twenty-five years back instrumental accompaniments were forbidden in the diocese of Lyons, and the Roman Church still prohibits the use even of the organ at high mass on the Sundays of Lent and Advent.

Long before the Reformation, most large churches in England possessed one or more organs. Durham Cathedral in the fourteenth century had as many as five. The Reformation in England does not seem to have had any perceptible effect upon church music, and in most cases the organs remained. The case was very different, however, with the Revolution. The Puritans seem to have vented their spite upon organs more than on any other article of church furniture except alone the altar, and a very lively account of their proceedings at Peterborough is given in "Mercurius Rusticus," but which is too long to quote here.

To the German Lutherans, however, must be allowed the credit of having developed the organ into the magnificent instrument which it has now become, and the immortal genius of John Sebastian Bach has given a literature to the instrument such as is possessed by no other, and is scarcely surpassed by the orchestra itself.

Ecclesiastical music had fallen into a very low condition in this country some forty years back, and those who are old enough can well recollect the state of things which then existed. The cathedral choirs were, of course, an exception, but even in cathedrals the organs were totally inadequate, few of them possessing a properly-arranged pedal-board, and all of them tempered according to the wretched old system, by which music could only be played in about three keys, and if written in any other it had to be transposed. These instruments, however, often had a fine effect of tone, from their position upon the choir-screen. The organs in parochial churches were, as a rule, dismal affairs. It is true that a few organs by Father Smith, Renatus Harris, etc., were to be found in some of the City churches; but even these would be looked upon as totally inadequate to modern requirements, although they undoubtedly possessed a delicacy of tone that was very charming as far as it went. The choirs in parochial churches scarcely deserved the name, and in village churches the music was often ridiculous. Organs were almost unknown, and the terrific instruments of torture, the "seraphin," the barrel-organ, and the "self-acting grinder," were amongst the favourite substitutes. The shocking tricks which these instruments played often caused consternation amongst the worshippers. I knew of a "self-acting grinder" which had the disagreeable habit of occasionally treating the congregation to the whole of its twelve tunes, one after another, if by accident the man in charge did not make a rush at it and hit a certain knob or button just at the right minute. And a friend of mine related to me a very remarkable scene at which he was present, and which happened at a village church in Buckinghamshire many years ago. A hand-grinding organ was the hero in this case. The "professional" performer upon the instrument happened to be absent, and an amateur undertook to serve for him. When the hymn was given out he took hold of the handle and ground and ground away, but nothing came of it all but a wheezing sound. In a state of intense alarm the unfortunate performer rushed to the front of the gallery and cried out, "Oh, yer reverence, this 'ere organ has gone and busted itself!"

The old village orchestras, which may possibly have been of value in earlier times had died out or dwindled away until they had become worse than useless. I recollect a very old clerk in a church near Norwich, who used to lead the singing with a cracked clarionet, and I remember his telling me that many years ago there was a full band, of which he was the only survivor. As, however, he told me this nearly thirty years back, and he was then over eighty, probably the band had been given up sixty or seventy years ago.

The very remarkable revival of ecclesiastical music in this country during the past thirty or forty years, and the wonderful development of the organ during the same period, have of necessity had an effect upon our ecclesiastical architecture and the arrangement of churches and chapels; for, wonderful as has been the improvement of the musical arrangements in Anglican churches, it has been equally remarkable amongst Congregationalists and Dissenters generally. In years gone by a hymn bawled in unison was considered sufficiently artistic in places where now one will hear first-rate choral singing, accompanied by a very excellent organ. Oratorios and organ recitals are also greatly favoured by our Nonconformist fellow-countrymen, who are doing much for the development of musical taste in connexion with religious worship.

In the Roman Catholic churches of Germany a somewhat remarkable movement has taken place in connexion with ecclesiastical music. It is the abandonment of the orchestra and the orchestral style of composition, of which Mozart and Haydn were such notable masters; and the revival of the earlier and severer or vocal style which is exemplified by the magnificent compositions of Palestrina, De Lasso, and others. The disappearance of the orchestra is leading to increased importance being given to the organ. Pugin complained some thirty years back that when the choir struck up in Cologne Cathedral, with its orchestral accompaniments, the columns and arches of the building seemed to disappear, and to become replaced by the pit, boxes, and stage of the Italian Opera. He would find no cause for that complaint now, as the operatic singing is replaced by the severest church compositions, and the orchestra has been abolished, and is about to be replaced by the largest church organ ever erected. This movement has now spread so far in Germany that in addition to the cathedral of Cologne it has been adopted in those of Ratisbon, Mayence, Aix-la-Chapelle, Münster, Eichstadt, Treves, Leichtmeritz, etc.

I have been obliged to dwell upon these musical facts at some length because they serve to show that the organ is every day becoming a more and more important adjunct to religious services, and during the last thirty years the progress which has been made in organ-building, and the enormous improvement which has taken place in everything connected with that instrument, is a remarkable fact in the history of music. Those who compare the organs erected half a century back with the magnificent instruments constructed by our leading English firms at the present time are simply astounded at the ingenious inventions and contrivances which have been introduced to overcome difficulties which rendered the older organs generally almost unplayable, and always most fatiguing to the performer. It must not, however, be forgotten that the more perfect the organ is the larger its bulk becomes; and the greater becomes the difficulty of the architect in finding a suitable place for it in a church or chapel.

In Mediæval times, and, in fact, as a general rule, until some thirty or forty years back, the organ gave an architect little trouble. As long as it was inclosed in a case some 10 ft. by 5 ft., and about 16 ft. high, it could be placed almost anywhere, and it did not demand consideration in planning a church; but when the same thing becomes a structure 20 ft. square and 30 ft. high, it can no longer be ignored, and provision must be made for it or it will become a serious disfigurement to the building. The difficulty must be boldly grappled with. It is simply useless for an architect to complain of the size of an organ or to suggest that it should be made smaller, so as to occupy less space; he might just as well complain of the size of a dining-table when he is designing a dining-room. The thing is wanted, and must be provided for, and the architect must discover some means of meeting the difficulty. I acknowledge that it is often a serious difficulty, but there is not the slightest chance of its vanishing or even becoming modified, as in all probability organs will get larger and larger as time goes on. All attempts at decreasing their size have hitherto proved complete failures.

There are of course, several things to be taken into consideration in selecting the position for an organ. The first, and most important, is that the instrument should be placed where it will be heard to the best advantage. The second is that it should be in such a situation that it may be serviceable both for the choir and also for congregational singing. The third, that it should be placed where it will be secure from injury arising from damp, excessive draughts, variations of heat and cold, and, especially, leaky roofs: the gutter of a roof should never, under any circumstances, be carried over an organ; yet, in two new churches which I have lately seen, the organ is placed under the valley between two roofs. In another church, recently restored at great expense, I noticed, a few weeks' since, that the gutter over the organ was insufficient; the consequence was that the open diapasons were receiving a regular douche, and the water was running out of the lips of the pipes! I pointed this out to the sexton, who was showing me over the church, and he said, "Well, sir, our organist do complain. A few Sundays back the water came down on his head during morning service; but what can be done? Our parson has spent a deal of money over that roof!" I suggested that at any rate the organ ought to be removed. Lastly, an organ must be placed in such a position that it is, if not an ornament to the building, at least no disfigurement to it.

Now, there are not many positions which a large organ can occupy in a church so as to fulfil all these conditions, and it is not surprising that it should have created a new feature in church architecture,—the organ chamber, which seems to be popular amongst Anglican Clergy, as it is to be found in very many new churches and has been added to not a few ancient ones, sometimes, I am bound to say, not to their improvement. It is, in fact, greatly to be doubted whether it is always advisable to remove an organ from the western gallery, where it has formerly stood, to place it in a kind of black-hole at the side of the chancel. This is often done under the idea that the position is more in accordance with ancient usage; but, in point of fact, while there is plenty of Mediæval authority for the western choir and organ gallery, there is none that I know of for an organ-chamber, which is an essentially modern feature in church architecture. Ancient organs in western galleries occur at Amiens Cathedral, the Cathedral of Constance, St. Mary's, Lübeck, St. Anne's, Augsburg, and St. Ulrich's, Augsburg; and although the organs have disappeared, or have been rebuilt, ancient western organ-lofts are to be seen at St. Stephen's, Vienna, Ulm, Liège, St. Mary's, Wurzburg, Ochsenfurth, the Carmelite Church at Boppard, St. Pantaleon at Cologne, &c. The last-named example, however, is so singular in its arrangement that it may have been removed from some other position.

The reason for placing an organ in an organ-chamber is that it may be near the choir, who are now usually placed in the chancel. Whether a choir of laymen was, in the Middle Ages, commonly placed in the chancel seems doubtful. That the chancel was nothing like so universal a position for the singers as is generally supposed, seems proved by the arrangement of many ancient churches; for instance, in the old Abbey Church of Cornelimünster, near Aix-la-Chapelle, the choir, with its stalls and complete ritual arrangement, is to be seen in the western gallery. The same is the case in one of the earlier abbey churches, that of Seligenthal, near Landshut, where the front of the choir gallery is adorned with a series of beautiful old pictures, and the interior fitted with regular choir-stalls. The same arrangement is to be noticed at the Abbey of St. Maximin at Trèves, though unfortunately here the whole of this interesting portion of the church is much modernised. At the minster church at Roermond, the arrangement of the choir was very singular; it was divided into two parts, each of which occupied one of the triforia of the nave. Each triforium choir terminated to the east in a small apse, bracketed out into the transept, containing an altar, both of which still exist. The original high altar also exists, not in the great apse, but in a smaller apse projecting from its eastern extremity. Mr. Cuypers, who has very carefully restored this church, believes the position to be original There is a rather later western organ-gallery, but the whole is thirteenth-century work. The curious church called the Alte Pfarrkirche, at Ratisbon, contains a singularly small chancel, only about 10 ft. square, but has a very deep choir gallery at the west end. The stalls have been removed, but the marks of where they were fixed can still be traced; the date is thirteenth century. At Coburg there was evidently a western choir in a gallery, with a little apse built out over the principal doorway; the arrangement is very picturesque externally. At Limburg-on-the-Lahn, the great triforium, which is vaulted and furnished with several altars, is called "männerchor"; whether it really served the purposes of a choir is a question which it is not possible to settle, but the name would seem to suggest it.

Notwithstanding the fury which has of late years been exercised against western organs and choir galleries, there is much to be said in their favour, and it would perhaps be well to hesitate before removing them, especially in old churches. The west end of a church is an excellent situation for a large organ, both musically and as regards its appearance. The splendid examples at Lubeck and Bois-le-Duc, and St. Anne's, Augsburg, serve to show what a fine feature can be made of an organ in this position. Musically speaking, also, the western gallery is a good position for a choir, and the arrangement lends itself very well to congregational singing. Much good carving and excellent work has been destroyed by the wholesale removal of west-end organ galleries. I cannot help also regretting the destruction of the numerous fine Renaissance organ cases which have disappeared, together with the western organ-galleries.

The organs in cathedral churches in England, at any rate, were generally placed upon the chancel or rood-screen, and it is impossible to suggest a better situation for the instrument, as every single favourable condition is here complied with. The organ has plenty of space abont it, and it is consequently sure to sound well. It is away from any walls which could convey its sound out of the building; it is excellent for choir work, and also for congregational purposes; it is more safe from damp and draughts than in any other part of the building, and less liable to variations of temperature. The position has also the sanction of antiquity, as it is recorded that there were organs upon the rood-screens of Durham, Peterborough, York, and Winchester cathedrals, long before the Reformation. In Continental churches a few organs still exist in this position. The Cathedral of Bruges, and that of St. Gomarre at Lierre, are cases in point, though, singularly, in the latter church the organ is sunk into the screen in such a way as to be invisible from the nave of the church. The removal of organs from choir-screens has been greatly in favour of late years, but I trust to live to see them all replaced in their former position. It seems that King Charles I. inaugurated this movement by ordering the removal of the organ in York Minster because it prevented the great east window being seen from the nave. It was, however, subsequently replaced.

When the organ is placed upon the choir-screen, one of two things seem to suggest themselves: either the congregation should be excluded from the choir, or the singers should be placed in the organ gallery, The present plan of mixing up the congregation and singers in the choir-stalls of the English cathedrals has many great objections. In the first place, it is not edifying to look down the throat of a man just opposite who is singing a solo, nor is it advisable to recognise too distinctly any individual singer in a church. One may have heard him sing music of a very different character, under very different circumstances, which it is undesirable to associate with his present performance, and yet the mind cannot help making this association, to the entire destruction of all solemn thoughts and religious feelings. It is also a great advantage to every choir to have a conductor, and not to trust too implicitly to the organist. Where music in the style of Palestrina is sung unaccompanied, a conductor becomes absolutely necessary. Now a conductor is strangely out of place in the middle of a congregation.

The destruction of choir screens, both here and on the Continent, is to be regretted. Not only are these screens great ornaments to churches, but they are of considerable use for musical purposes. The magnificent rood-screens at Münster and Bois-le-Duc were, when I first recollect them, used positively as choir-screens, and the effect was remarkably fine. Both have now, unfortunately, been removed. I am told that the screens at Tournay and Bruges are threatened with the same fate, chiefly because they are not Gothic! Some years back the choir of Norwich Cathedral sang from the screen, and I fancy there must be ancient authority for this usage. In France the rood-screen is called "jubé," and I cannot help associating this name with the first word of the Complin Service,—"Jube domne benedicere." Possibly the Complin Service may have been sung from the rood-loft, and hence the name "jubé," as given to this feature of Church architecture. In Germany the rood screen is called by a different term in almost every church. At Münster it was called "Apostelngang,"—I fancy, from the statues of the Apostles which adorned it. At Halberstadt it is called "Bishofstuhl" or "ambon"; whether it really served as a bishop's throne or no, it is impossible to say. At Hildesheim it is called "Letner," a word closely akin to our word lectern,—probably because the Gospel was read from it. It should be noted that, although the rood-screen has generally been destroyed in France, yet the Gospel is always read from the place where it formerly stood. In some old descriptions of churches I have found the words 'pulpitum," "paradisus," used to signify the rood-screen.

Another position for the choir is to the rear of the altar. It is certainly the most ancient of all positions, as may be seen by the arrangement of the basilican churches. It is an excellent position from every point of view, and remarkably convenient, especially in apsidal churches. The great difficulty, however, is the organ. In French churches, where this arrangement is not uncommon, there are generally two organs,—one a small instrument for the choir, and the other placed in the nave of the church for voluntaries and congregational purposes. The disadvantage of this is, of course, its expense, as it necessitates two organs and two organists. I am aware that there is an invention by means of which the same organist can play both organs at once by the application of electricity. It would be very desirable that this invention should succeed, but owing to the expense, or some mechanical difficulties, it has not met with the success which one could wish. I trust, however, that it will not be lost sight of, for, if it could be made thoroughly practicable, it would solve many difficulties, and it may turn out to be of the greatest possible value, both from an architectural and musical point of view.

THE PROFESSIONAL STAFF OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THERE are times when an Editor must, despite his private wishes, heed current opinions. The subject of this article presents a case in point, for continued and emphatic pressure from writers on musical topics, contributors and correspondents hailing from different parts of the country, demand attention on this topic; and I must, perforce, either find room separately for the expression of some of these different opinions, or speak of them collectively in one article, the course I have elected to pursue. My decision in this matter has gained strength from the fact that my esteemed contributors and correspondents have, without any want of respect for the eminent artists forming the professional staff of the Royal College of Music, thought well to criticise but not to express approval in, the general selection of the professors, as forming in their estimation an incomplete representation of our present artistic strength. It is perhaps needless to add that I only propose to quote a few typical opinions. One of our most distinguished country professors pleads disappointment on the ground that the chosen staff is not representative enough, inasmuch as a large number of our chief exponents of different departments of the art have been overlooked, including the most prominent men in certain branches of artistic skill. One contributor, holding a leading position in the metropolis, but not connected with any scholastic institutions, is anxious, while acknowledging the individual merits of many of the selected professors, to express his opinion, that the list should have been made from the very first an exceedingly strong one, even in excess of the present teaching requirements of the College, in order to have secured a large national confidence in the policy of recognising merit apart from extraneous influences, both as regards the selection of teachers and the election of scholars. He further protests that the staff ought in the departments of singing and pianoforte playing to have been made stronger in lady teachers, who are at present he considers quite inadequately represented. One writer is anxious to know why Mr. Sims Reeves' name is not on the list, seeing that that gentleman was understood to have made the noble offer of undertaking the duties of a teacher gratuitously. It seems to me unnecessary to pursue this matter further, especially as I am anxious not to prejudge the work to be done at the Royal College, or to impede in any way the building up of an important institution, even though I know that criticism must naturally be advanced, and will rightfully claim the daylight of the press upon the proposals as well as upon the doings of those responsible for the conduct of an institution claiming national proportions. It would have been impossible for the authorities to have satisfied all sections of the musical world in their selection of assistants. At the same time, it would have been prudent to have advanced in the selection of professors a little more beyond the lines of the National Training School. However, a dispassionate examination of the list will, one rejoices to observe, convince the reader of the presence of much intellectual and practical strength. It would be unreasonable to expect the College authorities to go far afield in their selection of professors. The ramifications of social and artistic society are too complicated to admit of the selection of any body of teachers upon the simple ground of recognised merit. Social advantages, the being near at hand, and the influence of friendly impulses, are motive powers which must inevitably, and will often righteously, play their part in every scheme of this kind. Again, the selection of a small number of good instructors for a prominent institution does not in the least interfere with the usefulness of the large number of eminent artists who could not be included in any plan save of a very comprehensive character. And it cannot be expected that the Royal College will be called upon to train more than a small percentage of the rich national stores of musical talent. It must be a source of congratulation to the governing powers of the Royal Academy of Music, to note that a goodly number of their professors and students have been accepted as professors in the Royal College of Music. Now the selection is made, and it includes many notable names to justify the hope, it is the business of all to wait patiently and hopefully for good results from the labours of the distinguished artists chosen. The raison d'être of the Royal College will be proved satisfactorily to the nation through the results gained, rather than through any speculative theories, however attractive, as to the present call for the existence of such an institution.

THE PASSION PLAY AT NICE.

The account of the performance of the Passion Play at Nice jars greatly with the feelings which obtain over such solemn subjects in England. The practice of giving at Easter a dramatic representation of the last scenes of our Saviour's life is a very ancient one, and in old times it was not without its uses. But to give a performance of these holy mysteries in a modern theatre with a grand orchestra, stage decorations, and the electric light pressed into service to illuminate the figure on the cross, seems singularly incongruous, when we remember the simplicity which surrounded the inception of Christianity. The old mysteries were played in the open air without footlights or scenery of any kind, and their simple idealism probably strengthened men's faith far more than all the realism of the modern stage-art can ever do. The behaviour of the audience, and their applause and laughter, hardly affords surprise to those who are painfully aware that most of the modern Italians are devoid of any religious sentiment whatever. But musicians, who remember that oratorio had its origin in Italy, and can recall the noble works of Palestrina, Leo, Durante, Vittoria, and other great composers that that gifted land has produced, cannot but experience a painful shock to learn that the music played during the progress of the sacred drama, given on Good Friday last, consisted of Suppé's overture to "The Poet and Peasant," which introduced the representation, dance music being played between the tableaux, the agony in the garden of Gethsemane being preceded by the "Fleur de Noblesse" waltz.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

Third Series.

V.

In the next rule given Cherubini tells us that: "As "in two and in three-part counterpoint, so in "four-parts, in the first species, parts may occa- "sionally be crossed for the space of two or three "measures at the utmost." This privilege, the theorist considers, "may effect the avoidance of many "faults, and induce at times a melodic flow in the "parts." Opinions differ as to the crossing of parts; some authorities objecting entirely to the setting up of such a privilege, and others allowing the exceptional use of such progressions in four-parts; for the liberty of occasionally being allowed to cross the parts in counterpoint of six, seven, or eight parts must, of course, be regarded as a necessary privilege at times. Undoubtedly there are serious objections to the crossing of vocal parts; for sympathetic vocal tones are not so distinctly traceable as are the less sympathetic and widely different sounds of distinct kinds of instruments, which may indeed be crossed for exceptional harmonic effects with decided gain now and then. Again, the voice parts suffer more than instruments from being disadvantageously placed as regards their different registers. On the whole, it is better for the student to deny himself the questionable privilege of crossing the parts in four-part counterpoint of the first species intended for voices. Next Cherubini repeats the unrelaxable admonition against the presence of consecutive perfect concords, whether octaves or fifths. He adds: "But two fifths "may be tolerated by contrary movement between "any two of the upper three parts, and between any "two of three lower parts. They are sometimes," he continues, "allowable between the two external "parts, but the permission for such progressions must "not be abused; and it is only available when all "other means of movement are found to be in vain." The student will not fail to notice the increase in the number of licensed progressions with the advance in the number of the parts to four. Now, if he be thoroughly in earnest in his contrapuntal work, he will regard each license as it is brought before him with watchful suspicion; inasmuch as the admission of every such license is liable to arise from weakness as well as from necessity. The permission to employ consecutive fifths by contrary motion in four parts is just one of those licenses to be regarded with wariness and circumspection. Their presence, whether between external or middle, or between one external and another internal voice part, is surely felt by a fairly keen ear to be only in a less degree objectionable than are such combinations when taken in direct motion. CHERUBINI does not seem inclined to sanction the license of octaves in contrary motion between two given parts. In truth, such a progression is, on the whole, more unsatisfactory than is the effect of two adjacent perfect fifths in contrary motion; for the octaves are weaker in their reiterated sounds than are the fifths, and they tend to produce a colourless and inefficiently pronounced harmony.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The popular notion that ladies do not succeed entirely as organ players, would be considerably disturbed in the minds of those entertaining the idea who chanced to be present at the recital of March 31st. Although one does not like the notion of a lady struggling with a big organ and engaged in work so trying and requiring such courage and watchful power as recital playing, save in rare instances, perhaps, it must be acknowledged that ladies can play the organ, and as pedalists are exceedingly neat and sure-footed, possibly by reason of incessant practice in measuring distances by their feet without being able, as men are in walking and pedal-playing, to watch their pedal movements. On the other hand, the power and grandeur of a large organ would seem to be best handled by the sterner strength of the "lords of creation," to say nothing of questions of mental power, which the writer will not venture upon, lest his opinions bring him into "hot water." Miss Theresa Beney, A.C.O., is indeed a very gifted young lady organist, and not without some playing experience. She succeeded best in Merkel's Fantasia and Fugue in A minor, and in Bach's Toccata in F, in which the aptitude of a lady for pedal playing was admirably illustrated, and Miss Beney's special executive skill was abundantly displayed. The opening piece was Wagner's "Tannhäuser" march. An allegretto by Gade, the minuet and trio in Bennett's symphony, and Smart's Prelude in D, all nicely manipulated, were the other organ solos. Mr. E. W. Parfitt played with Miss Beney Merkel's well known Duo for violin and organ. He also played a solo cleverly, and Handel's Largo was played by violin, organ, and pianoforte, Mr Fountain Meen taking the last named instrument. Miss Eleanor Rees, R.A.M., sang remarkably well. She was recalled after Donizetti's "A mio Fernando," and encored in Gounod's characteristic song "The Worker." To-night the organ soloist will be Mr. W. G. Wood, F.C.O., whose fine playing has already been recognised at the Institute.

THE ORGAN IN BEVERLEY MINSTER.

BY ONE OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

The organ in Beverley Minster, built by Snetzler in the year 1768, has always been noted for its beauty of tone, and for its general effectiveness, prior to being removed from the screen on which it originally stood, to the floor of the north aisle of the nave, where it now stands. It contains the following :—

GREAT ORGAN.. GG TO E.

1. Open Diapn. (large scale).	8. Sesquialtra (3 ranks) 4 ranks bass.
2. Open Diapn. (small scale).	9. Fourniture (4 ranks).
3. Stopped Diapason.	10. Mixture (3 ranks).
4. Principal.	11. Trumpet.
5.*Wald Flute.	12. Clarion.
6. Twelfth.
7. Fifteenth.

15.*Clarabel Flute.	20. Fifteenth.
16. Stopt Diapason (bass).	21. Sesquialtra (3 ranks).

25. Principal.	30. Larigot.
26. Fifteenth.	31. Trumpet.
27. Twelfth.	32. Hautboy.

PEDAL ORGAN.

33.*Double Open Diapason, GGG 24ft. to E.	34.*Open Diapason, GG 12ft. to E.

COUPLERS.

35.*Choir to Great.	39.*Swell to Choir in octaves above.
36.*Swell to Great.	40.*Great to Pedals.
37.*Swell to Choir.	41.*Choir to Pedals.
38.*Choir to Great in octaves below.	42.*Pedal pipes in octaves above.

The organ was improved and enlarged by Forster and Andrews in 1848, all the stops marked with an asterisk being by them; the bass of sesquialtra on Great organ from Middle C was also added by them. In 1856 Gray and Davison put new keyboards, and substituted a fifteenth in Swell for a dulcet flute, which had been among the additions made by Forster & Andrews in 1848. In 1864 Postill, of York, put new trumpet in Great organ; with these exceptions, all the rest of the instrument is by Snetzler. In 1874 the Pedal board was converted from a G to a C. Forster and Andrews also carried down the Swell from Fiddle G to Tenor C. Some few years ago, the old screen on which the organ stood, and which was a hideous mixture of classic and Gothic, was removed, and a very handsome screen of carved oak, designed by the late Sir Gilbert Scott, and which contained iron pillars, concealed from view, for the purpose of supporting the organ, was erected in its place. It is now proposed to re-erect the organ on the screen, but it is also proposed to spend £2000 on the instrument, and, horror of horrors, it is to have no case. There is simply to be an array of bare pipes. The Archbishop of York, so I hear, has refused to allow another case to be erected at all, and it is said—with what truth I know not—that he has been instigated to this decision by the Vicar of the Minster. A design has been prepared which is simply hideous, and this in the face of a decision by Mr. J. O. Scott, who has been employed as architect to the Minster since his father's death, not to sanction the erection of the organ on the screen without a case. But this is not the worst;—the organ doubtless is in a dilapidated state, and requires rebuilding. Every bit of Snetzler's work which is worth retaining should be retained, and treated with the most loving and reverent care, and if it be necessary, as possibly it is, to supplement this work by modern additions, they should be made to harmonise and blend with the existing diapason work of Snetzler, which cannot easily be surpassed, if equalled. I, for one, very much fear, however, that if the £2000 is spent, it will, or the bulk of it, be on work which will completely drown the mellow, rich, yet brilliant tone of the old work; that, indeed, the identity of the old organ will be lost in the crowd of new additions. It is time to protest against the contemplated desecration: there are too few of the fine mellow-toned old organs left. Pray let us try to save the one in Beverley Minster. In the summer of last year I made a cathedral tour in the South-West of England, and I heard there a lovely old organ that I would have gone miles out of my way to listen to. I also heard a bran new monster, and the contrast was as great as first hearing Joachim on the finest Straduarius and then hearing a street musician on a shilling fiddle. Such a contrast I dread at Beverley between the old organ and the contemplated new one. The rage now-a-days seems to be for noise and not for music; and I trust that my protest and that of others will not be in vain.

GAETANO DONIZETTI.

BY MEM. FAC. ADV.

The following extracts from an article in St. Cecilia Magazine will be found interesting:—

Among the Elysian group of magnificent lyricists who followed the brilliant Rossini, none has obtained a more merited prominence than Gaetano Donizetti. He was born at Bergamo in 1798, under the dominance of a lucky star, for his noble exemplar preceded him by only about six years. Educated at the Conservatory of Naples under the foremost scientists of his time, he had all that artistic training could supply, and he emerged upon the arena of professional life just when the Pierian stream of melody, which rose with the Swan of Pessaro, began to overflow its banks and spread fertility around. The birds of dismal omen who had soared and croaked in the preceding twilight had drooped their wings when the sunny brightness of the joyous "Barber" proclaimed the advent of a new day. Donizetti studied and admired the score, and, despite the denunciations of his pharisaic instructors, was not faithless but believing. Continuing his research, he read and analysed every Rossinian production he could obtain, and then matured his own method and formed his own style. That they differed little from those of Rossini, is admitted on all hands. Plainly, in inspiration, arrangement, and development, the ideas of both are akin. The same voluptuous sweetness characterises the spirit of their melody, though in form the similarity is less, for in gorgeous embroidery and climatic intensification Rossini is undoubtedly supreme. Their harmonial and orchestral art are in substantial accord. They were both endowed with dramatic instinct in a high degree. They wrote with an ease which made them marvellously prolific, a clearness which made them universally intelligible, an emotional energy which secured them the sympathies of every class in every audience, depositing their gems in crystal caskets which, gleaming like diamonds on excited minds, became mirrored in delightful recollections. In the filiation of musical and poetic forms, they were pretty nearly abreast. They both belong to the priesthood of song, and are well entitled to wear the laurels and bear the mantle of genius.

For the precise line of demarcation between the artistic capacities of the two men, we should probably search in vain. How much Donizetti was indebted for his effects to the same translucent fountain of inspiration as his brilliant contemporary, how much to the study of his works, how much to his own organisation, how much to his better musical education and superior literary ability, how much the popular culture and appreciation the new developments had caused, it would be quite as futile to enquire. He was not a precocious child. He gave no preliminary indications of talent. When he began his musical career the fetters of the formalists were broken and the finest phrases of Rossini were echoing around. But though a pupil, he was neither a devotee nor an imitator of his great predecessor. Conscious, apparently, that those who attempt the experiment of Icarus are apt to meet his fate, he kept to his native vein—the specialty of his own musical organisation. Evidently he could not pour out his arias with the same dashing impetuosity as the Pessarite. While his harmonies smack of the school more and of nature less—his intervals are not so vocalistic—his modulations not so easy. Yet his melodial dialect is his own. And so is his operatic ideal. In the representative adaptation of sound to sentiment, situation, and sense, he was rather before than behind his master, and if he had not the Janus-like vision which regarded melody and harmony at once—which felt their simultaneous progression—to the same extent as Rossini, he had a breadth of understanding which kept him away from the ineffective tenuity of the old musicians on the one hand and from the labyrinthine mazes and unnatural inversions of the German potentates upon the other. With the latter he had evidently no sympathy. He believed that when harmony took the place of melody it should be upon the stage and not in the orchestra—that to conduct the motive-ideas of a piece by instrumental expression rather than by vocal, was to abandon the operatic for the symphonic; in effect, to accomplish the suicide of the art. The canon of orchestral perfection is that the instruments should aid the voices to the utmost, without overcoming, much less extinguishing, them. This canon he never violated.

A devotee of beauty and order, Donizetti never indulged in the spasmodic shrieks and discordant howls of the boaster of Bayreuth. We cannot agree with those who condemn his freer use of recitative than Rossini. Recitative is a compromise between melody and colloquy, and is, indeed, essential to the completeness of operatic art. When properly constructed, it makes the dialogue musical without diminishing either its verbal significance or naturalness. Musical intonation need neither interfere with propriety of gesture, facial expression, precision of utterance, nor dramatic action. If any of these are wanting, that is attributable to the weakness of the artist, not the incapacity of the art. It has been truly said of the recitatives of Rossini that "their eloquence is equal to that of the most beautiful airs, with which the spectator is equally charmed and surprised." The criterion of excellence in this, as in all other forms of musical expression, is that it should be appropriate to the character, sentiment, and situation. We are disposed to think that, upon the whole, Donizetti has adhered to this criterion with more rigidity than his exemplar. Ex voluptate fides nascitur. To us the intonation of dialogue in opera is much more agreeable than the tone of ordinary speech. And while the musical ideas of the Bergamite were symmetrical and clear, his dramatic power was great. He could direct the passions and emotions to any required situation, diminishing, suspending, or intensifying the interest with commanding skill, and exhibiting a familiarity with the phases of feeling very rarely surpassed. In one sense, indeed, he was more dramatic than Rossini, his demands upon the singer being less, on the actor more—being less floridly vocal, he admitted more histrionic force.

In the course of his long and brilliant career, Donizetti composed between fifty and sixty operas, each of them abounding in the characteristics of his style, and exhibiting the judgment "that softens all, and tempers into beauty." Though a prophet who had honour in his own country, he had greater profit if not greater honour elsewhere. There was a wide demand for his compositions. They delighted not only the professional and the amateur, but also the hearer of ordinary taste.

It must be admitted that the way was prepared for Donizetti by his brilliant and dauntless predecessor and contemporary. He had no professional antagonisms to overcome, no antiquated notions of indignant conservatives to detrude, no scientific errors to uproot, no novel system of improved method to discover—all was done to his hand. Beyond, the dona nobis pacem had been emphatically pronounced by the public, and the assaults of the elders and high priests of the old dispensation effectually suppressed. While Rossini waded so long and painfully in the troubled waters of the Stygian stream, Donizetti crossed it at once, his merits having been fully recognised upon the appearance of his first production, while his popularity increased with his assiduous culture and more daring compositional flights, till it attained its brilliant consummation with his "Lucia," "Pasquale," and "Lucrezia," the splendid fruitage of his prime. Nor has his popularity sensibly declined. He looms upon us still lofty and imposing as a Himalayan peak, bright and expansive as the milky way, his clustering beauties resplendent and sublime in the ethereal strata of the sky. It was when encrowned with a full-blown wreath of honour and blest with the conviction of an immortal renown, that the waves of care and sorrow began to roll heavily over the great Italian. A fate even worse than death befel him who had so long swayed the rod of empire over so many minds in every region of the world of art. The fiend of darkness imprisoned his soul. He ceased to know others or himself. His lucid judgment failed to maintain unequal war with his wildly vagarious fancy. Upon his splendid faculties, so exquisitely framed to inhale celestial melodies, the light of reason shone no more. His night of anguish was long. Hope, indeed, occasionally inspired his friends, but the faithless siren was false, and the fell destroyer triumphed at last. He has taken his place among the eternal stars in his own heaven of song. That his transit was not so sweetly serene as we could have wished for one who had so often cast the spell of beauty over the minds and hearts of his race, will ever be regretted by the appreciators of his art.

The Duke and Duchess of Albany will attend the Leeds Festival, and the Duke will act as president.

A MUSICAL CLUB THREE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

When the Minnesingers of the Middle Ages, those noble singers of love and chivalry, passed away, because of the opposition of the Church, which could not bear their freedom of speech, their place was taken by the less inspired bourgeoisie, the merchants, the middle classes of Germany, who sought a relaxation from the cares of business in the practice of music. The rules of the societies of Meistersingers have often been published. In Germany, and even in the Netherlands, their influence, if not so elevating as that of the Minnesingers, was certainly as wide-spread. From the example set by these societies, musical clubs seem to have been the greatest delight of the better classes in those early times. We have recently come into possession of a work which strikingly illustrates the character of the lesser clubs of the sixteenth century. It is the album of a singing club of Amsterdam, which began its career in 1560 and terminated about 1590. The members of the club seem to have been of noble families, and the organization one of especial excellence, judging by the care taken in admitting members and visitors. The work is in manuscript, written in a small blank book of very antique style. The rules of the club are in Latin, some of it of slightly inferior quality, but are richly worth translating.

RULES.

As nothing is more useful or honourable than perpetual study alternated occasionally with pleasure, it has seemed to us proper to form a society to which we will come each week at a o'clock* (and remain until 4†) to recreate ourselves from the cares of labour by the modulations of music.

It seems good to us to limit the active membership to ten associates. If, however, any one is possessed of a good voice and a knowledge of music, there will be no reason to reject him as an associate.

Of the knowledge of music and the quality of voice of a candidate, the majority of the club shall judge.

Members may bring a reasonable number of friends to the meetings, if they desire.

As our object is to enjoy ourselves in a reputable and moderate manner, drunkenness is forbidden.

He who misleads any member in this respect shall also pay a fine.‡

Besides beer and new wine, nothing shall be brought to us.

Books of music and all necessary instruments shall be in readiness constantly.

In singing, this order shall be observed: only three songs or motets shall be given in succession, and, if possible, instrumental pieces shall be alternated.

He who, by chattering, laughing, or otherwise shall disturb the music, shall pay a fine of one shilling.§

He who introduces any guests must be responsible for and pay any fines they may incur.

Excuses for absence will not be taken; but one who is sick, or who is obliged to travel more than ten miles, may be excused from paying any fine.

He who comes too late must pay one shilling.

He who fails to come at all must pay six shillings.

He who misses in succession must pay eighteen shillings.

It is not the proper place for low or rude stories, and he who is accused of this shall be fined according to the vote of the members.

Scolding or brawling shall be first admonished and then fined.

He who is admonished and fined, and repeats the offence at the next meeting, shall pay double the previous fine.

The treasurer shall be elected every six months. He shall warn and censure all who transgress the rules.

If any one complains of his ruling, the matter shall be laid before the club.

He himself is liable to censure by a vote of the members.

He shall have charge and care of the constitution, books, and all things belonging to the society, and must read the archives and accounts at every meeting.

He who is admitted to membership in our society must pay ten shillings, and any member who wishes to leave the society must pay the same amount.

The above rules are written in a beautiful hand, similar to that found in the old missals. In the same hand are found some Latin praises of music, partially taken from Cicero and partially (we believe) original. One of these is well worth preserving,—Musica lætitiæ comes, Medicina Dolorum,—"Music the companion of joy, the medicine of sorrow."

* The day is not given, but was probably Sunday.

‡ This is evidently aimed at the senseless custom of reciprocal drinking,—i.e., "treating."

§ The Roman denarius is specified, but its value probably is best represented by the Dutch Shilling.

In the long list of signatures made by visitors to the club, we find ample proof that the society was held in high estimation. There are visitors from Brussels, Antwerp, Leyden, and other distant cities. There are no famous musical names, for Holland was undergoing (or had undergone) too severe a struggle to give forth great composers at this time. The Inquisition with its horrors had just been expelled. The war of "the beggars" was even yet raging in the devastated country. The Prince of Palma had not yet let loose all the rigours of war on the Southern provinces. William of Orange had not yet been assassinated. Three reminders of these painful times are found in the book of our singing club. The first is the name "Rogerino de Montmorency" written among the visitors to the club. A Montmorency could only have been in Amsterdam at that time in the character of a prisoner of war. The second instance is a page of secret writing at the close of the book. The third is contained in a page headed Extemporaria hæc oratiuncula in Musices laudem recitatas est per puerum Joannem Gheys, Anno 1581, 7 Octobris,—an oration delivered by a school-boy named John Gheys, over three hundred years ago, which chance has preserved to modern times. The high character of our musical club is again proved by the fact that the oration was made before them at their invitation, and was given in Latin, and met with such success that it was copied in the album of the club. The boy's allusion to the misfortunes of that epoch is brief but unmistakable. He says, "The calamities of the present age might move us more to sighs and tears than to music and playing." Apart from this, the "little oration" is apparently a school-boy's production, and jumbles up Cicero, Seneca, Nero, Socrates, and every sage, philosopher, potentate, or what not, who had exhibited a leaning toward music, in hopeless confusion.

Altogether, the little album affords us an entertaining glimpse at the interior life of a singing club of three hundred years ago.—Musical Herald (U.S.A.).

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus.Bac., F.C.O., gave, on April 3rd, an enjoyable lecture on "Balfe and his works" at Neumeyer Hall. The musical illustrations consisted of vocal numbers, given very artistically, by Miss Julia Jones, Mr. W. H. Brereton, and Mr. Walter Clifford, and a most interesting sonata for pianoforte and violoncello admirably rendered by Messrs. Burnham Horner and W. C. Hann. To hear the composer of the "Bohemian Girl" on the classical ground of what is known as chamber music, was indeed to many a new experience. The work in question, the Sonata in A flat, has a charming adagio written in five-four measure. In the execution of this, and indeed of the whole work, Messrs. Burnham Horner and W. C. Hann showed very high artistic attainments. Equally good was the vocal music given. Miss Jones, with a charming mezzo voice and refined manner, sang the original version of what is now called "The power of love." Mr. Walter Clifford sang "The peace of the valley" and "The green trees" with genuine expression and much power. Mr. Brereton gave the fine song "From bushy beds of silver Nile," and "We'll meet again" (a favourite of the composer) with fervour and in good style. The accompaniments received a very musicianly rendering from the hands of Mr. Burnham Horner. As to the lecture itself, it was a combination of sound critical observation, sympathetic discernment, and genial appreciation of both the man and his music, such as would be expected of so natural, graceful, and accomplished a lecturer as Mr. W. A. Barrett is everywhere known to be. Mr. C. E. Stephens occupied the chair and delivered some interesting observations. Hearty votes of thanks were accorded to the lecturer and to the artists so ably illustrating the admirable paper read. Dr. F. E. Gladstone neatly proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was seconded by Mr. G. A. Osborne, Balfe's fellow countryman and life-long friend, in a speech of much interest and character, in which he paid tribute to Mr. Barrett for his efforts in connection with the Balfe memorial tablet in Westminster Abbey. At the close of the lecture Mr. Barrett kindly displayed a collection of Balfe's scores and musical notes. It was announced that Mr. H. J. Stark will lecture on "Counterpoint" on May 1st.

Passing Events.

Dr. Horton Allison played his new "Lord Wolseley's March" at the banquet recently given in Manchester, in honour of the successful general.

Readers will rejoice to know that Mr. C. Warwick Jordan has returned from America much improved in health.

Señor Sarasate announces an interesting concert on Monday, April 9th, at St. James's Hall, with orchestra, when amongst other solos he is to play Beethoven's Concerto for violin.

Miss Agnes Miller, mentioned in Birmingham letter, p. 194, as resident in that town, has been for some time located in London, though visiting the capital of the Midlands (professionally) one day a week.

Mr. G. A. Osborne charmed the members of the Musical Association on April 2nd by reading a paper in which he narrated many of his personal recollections of some of the great musicians of the last fifty years.

The ninth annual concert by the violin classes in connection with the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, and under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, was given on March 31st. The following artists took prominent parts:—Miss Mary Beare, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. E. Passett, vocalists. Solo violin, Mr. T. E. Gatehouse; violoncello, Messrs. Kendall and Parker; pianoforte, Miss Gatehouse and Mr. H. S. Webster. The programme included pieces in which the strings and pianoforte took part.

With much regret it is said that Sir Michael Costa although progressing favourably, is not gaining ground as rapidly as his more sanguine friends desire. It is a great pity that the question of conducting the Handel Festival is not settled negatively. It is sheer madness to expect Sir M. Costa to be prepared to face the serious labours of such an undertaking, and his best meaning friends are anxious that he may be induced to give up all idea of attempting such a task. It is time he had complete rest now.

Captain Evatt Acklom, who is a vigorous, eloquent, and picturesque reader, gave a recital and concert at the Eyre Arms Assembly Rooms, on April 5th. The programme included selections from our best poets, novelists and some music of a popular character. Two songs, "The Kiss," and "We'll never be parted again" (MS.), by Mrs. Henry Scobell were sung, the last having a harp obbligato part. The musical performers were:—Mrs. Shipway, Miss Norah Hayes, Mdme. Inez Bell, Miss Adele Myers, Signor Ria, vocalists. Solo pianoforte, Miss Constance Erica; solo harp, Herr Carl Oberthur; conductor and accompanist, Mr. Guiseppe Dinelli.

The London Sunday School Choir (President, Sir Andrew Lusk, Bart., M.P.), gave a concert in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music, on April 4th, at the Royal Albert Hall. The choir consisted of 1,600 selected voices. The programme included selections from the works of well-known masters, Gounod's "Ave Maria," with organ, pianoforte, and violin obbligati, and also the "Manificat," composed for this choir by Mr. David Davies, to be accompanied by the composer. The artists were:—Senorita Lucia Carreras; the family quartet; violin, Miss Maria Schumann, of the Guildhall School of Music. Conductor, Mr. Luther Hinton; organist, Mr. W. G. Horncastle.

The following is the list of professors at the Royal College of Music:—Violin, Mr. Henry Holmes, Herr Gompertz; viola, Mr. Gibson, violoncello, Mr. Edward Howell; double bass, Mr. A. L. White; pianoforte, Mdme. Arabella Goddard, Herr Pauer, Mr. Franklin Taylor, Mr. John F. Barnett; organ, Mr. Walter Parratt, Mr. G. C. Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

Many years ago I read somewhere the fable of the Nightingale, the Cuckoo, and the Donkey. As far as I can remember it was as follows:—Once upon a time a conceited cuckoo challenged a nightingale to sing, but as it happened late in the evening and far from any frequented path, the only chance person or thing that passed that way was an old donkey, and he was called upon to decide between these songsters of the grove. As soon as the cuckoo had finished his unvaried ditty, the donkey thus commended his performance:—"I admire your efforts greatly, and I like the composition. The form is perfectly simple, and the intervals are natural and very charming." It was now the nightingale's turn to begin, and when the song was ended the donkey said, "I have listened to you, I must confess, with much impatience, for you transgress every kind of rule by your extraordinary modulations and outrageous progressions; so much so indeed, that I defy any one to follow you, or to comprehend any part of your song. Let the cuckoo come and receive the prize." This fable is by no means flattering to those who, with their so-called "orthodox" views, condemn everything but what is in accordance with certain old rules and regulations, many of which are sometimes "more honoured in the breach than in the observance." On the other hand, the men of the so-called "new school" are so absorbed in the contemplation of their own attainments, and of the present deplorable state of music, that their special mission in this world appears to be that of putting everyone right who ventures to differ from them. Of these two extreme parties—so far as one may judge from his symphony—Mr. Parry evidently steers quite clear. Wagner's style, in a modified form, is at times apparent, it is true; but the wild uproar, which is supposed by some men of his school or party to make up for lack of ideas, is nowhere to be found in Mr. Parry's music. His phrasing, however, is often designedly interwoven and complex, and this, for the time, prevents the ear from resting upon any individual theme; but there is no lack of melody, as some may suppose, for the respective parts flow into each other with much freedom, grace, and ingenuity. His over-elaboration is sometimes apparent, and although a fault, it is one into which the best writers occasionally fall—Brahms, to wit. Upon the whole, the work appears to be a happy blending of modern style with the spirit of his great predecessors. The symphony was well played and cordially received, and Mr. Parry showed himself at the end gallery in reply to many calls.

Chopin's concerto was beautifully played by Mr. Richard Rickard, who made his first appearance at these concerts. To a bright and clear tone he adds feeling and high intelligence.

Miss Annie Marriott was not so successful as she often is. Her voice is finer than ever, but the simplicity of style and manner, which until very lately characterized her, are now unfortunately exchanged for a more showy and meretricious manner. R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

I did not hear Mr. Hubert Parry's Symphony at Birmingham last Autumn, and I cannot, at present, refer to a file of the Musical Standard, in order to ascertain what opinion was expressed by your learned correspondent at the time. My own opinion is unbiassed, and I give it—valeat quantum! Let me candidly avow a sad disappointment. The symphony struck me as far too long, generally uninteresting, and often tedious. The gush of genuine inspiration seems to be always wanting; the scoring, no doubt, scholastic and effective. The first allegro (the "fire" whereof I looked for in vain), is too protracted; and the coda common-place. The andante, mild and Mozartean at the outset, is spoiled by the vague and unmeaning theme of bruyant character, which intrudes itself like an unwelcome Paul Pry. The scherzo sounds fresh, yet it is still a steeple-chase after ideas; the trio is too long. The finale, spirited and well worked out, I esteem the best movement. The annotator "G," himself rather a diffuse writer, has to say, at least twice, that the theme (in question) is "treated at some length." Oh, for what grammar books call the "concise" style of writing! Let Brahms and his imitators read, and get by heart a few chapters of Tacitus. Breviores esse laborent!

Mr. Rickard's touch, style, and execution are just adapted for the execution of Chopin's music. The ballet airs of Gounod, especially the Tarantella in A minor (called an "Italian" dance), are very pretty. A. M.

Enthusiasm plays a still more useful part in criticism than does cynicism, even though praise, like blame, must be guardedly given. A highly esteemed contributor thus writes, anent Mr. Hubert Parry's new work:—It is scarcely in good taste, nor is it complimentary to a true artist for his fellow-countrymen to congratulate themselves on his nationality; but if some of us may be tempted to rejoice that Mr. Hubert Parry is an Englishman, his works cannot fail to remind us that he claims a higher position than we are giving him, and that he already belongs—not to any particular nation, but to the grand Universal School of Art. Who is conscious that Berlioz was a Frenchman when listening to his "Harold" Symphony? (to be given at to-day's concert). Who can trace the nationality of Goetz in his one glorious creation in symphonic form? The whole artistic world, and not in any special degree his native land, claims the artist as its own; for one touch of genius, like "one touch of nature, makes the whole world kin." That Mr. Parry has this touch of genius that breaks through the barrier of nationality, will hardly be questioned by those who carefully listened to his first symphony last week. I say "carefully," advisedly; for the work is one of earnest thought and deep feeling—perhaps at times the thought rather overpowers the feeling—and it might not impress a superficial listener. Moreover, like most real thinkers, Mr. Parry has a decidedly original manner, though he is strictly orthodox in his modes of expressing and arranging his thoughts. The melodies are of a broad and noble cast, growing out of each other in the most natural and interesting manner. The parts move with the greatest freedom, and are interestingly woven; there is no striving after effect, yet the work is truly effective; it is full of enthusiasm, yet well digested—as far removed from eccentricity as from pretentiousness or triviality; there is not one unworthy or flippant thought, nor one ineffective phrase from beginning to end. B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

There can be no better way of closing these different estimations of the new work than by giving the following words of a calm, just, and experienced writer:—

Dr. C. H. H. Parry's Symphony in G is one of the most important works that has proceeded from an English pen. It was, as may be remembered, praised to the echo on its production at last year's Birmingham Festival; but provincial verdicts in such art matters are lightly esteemed in London, and until the metropolis has placed its cachet of approval on a work, its success elsewhere is only a succes d'estime. Now, however, that the symphony in question has met with the marked approbation of the critical Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts audience of musicians and amateurs, it will enjoy a renown that Birmingham cannot confer. The work is undoubtedly that of a thoughtful musician, well acquainted with the resources of his art, and possessing considerable experience as to how they can be effectively used. In the general laying out and form of the symphony, there is no breaking away from old bounds, or indulging in the license degenerating into uncouth vagaries, which is so dear to the hearts of certain composers striving hard after an originality. At the same time, Mr. Parry's work has a freshness of thought, a decision of purpose, and an amount of scholarly treatment amply sufficient to please the ear of a general audience, and to satisfy the intelligence of musicians. In saying this, it is not necessarily implied that the work makes a new departure, or is of marked originality. Rather must the critic commend the author in that he has worked mostly in the old form; a shape that some German pseudo-critics have proclaimed exhausted, cramped, and inefficient for complete musical expression. In this abused (though eternally true) form Mr. Parry has written a thoroughly satisfactory work. When we hear these denunciations about worked out and stilted forms, we can but recall to mind with delight the beautiful music that the dead great masters of our art have written on these now despised lines; and further, remember a severe personal proverb anent, "bad workmen finding fault with their tools." Mr. Parry's themes are mostly well-chosen and contrasted; they attack the ear with just that amount of individuality that leit-motiven should possess, and are far more grateful than are many of the hideous little phrases which are honoured with that fine sounding appellation. It should, however, be said, that his chief themes are not so concise as they might be, and it may be also remarked that this quality of over-lengthening is to be found throughout the work. The first movement is over developed, and contains too much remplissage; but there are many charming thoughts to be found in it, and the coda with the climax growing out of it is masterful. There is a weird uncertainty about the key tonality of the Andante, but this is produced mainly through the free use of suspensions and anticipations; its second subject, in B minor, with its uncommon orchestration, is just one of those rugged pieces of power that might have sprung from the brain of Beethoven. The Scherzo and two Trios are the most striking portions of the Symphony; here the composer's genius is distinctly apparent, and the originality he exhibits is fraught with fair hopes for his future efforts. Purists may object that portions of the movement seem too heavy and coarse for a Scherzo; but it should be pointed out that there is a certain amount of novelty in the form of the movement, as well as in the materials employed; in any case a distinct success is achieved. In the last movement we miss inspiration, and though the score is replete with ingenious scholarship, there is considerable labour exercised over it. The orchestration, moreover, is thick in places, and seems to lack the spontaneity met with elsewhere. The Finale, however, is ambitious and brilliant; it contains clear references to the principal subjects of the earlier movements, and brings the work to a satisfactory ending. In conclusion, it may be added that the symphony gives one to some extent the impression that it has been composed piecemeal, rather than that it has been an unified and rapidly thought out work. Portions of it certainly differ as to the value, but it contains plenty of bright ideas and happy effects; these the composer has caught and fixed on his tone-canvas with so much skill and success, that the musical world will look forward with no small interest to the next symphonic work from his pen.

MR. E. AGUILAR'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Mr. Aguilar began his short course of Easter recitals at his own house in Gloucester Crescent, Hyde Park, on Monday afternoon. As usual, he displayed his versatility and catholicity of taste by playing a long list of pieces by "various masters." The list included the ninth number of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "Suite de Pièces," in B major; Beethoven's Sonata in A, Op. 101; Liszt's fifth "Rhapsodie Hongroise," in E minor and major; and several of Mr. Aguilar's own works, to wit, the MS. sonata of three movements in A minor; "Arethuse" (a melody) in A major; a Romanza in B flat; the "Day-dream," in E flat; the fantasia on "Lucia di Lammermoor"; the "Pensée Fugitive," in B flat, and the spirited "Carnival Dance" in C major. One of Mr. Aguilar's pupils, Miss A. Gold, was entrusted with Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53, and a pretty valse of Janotha in E major. The sonata of Mr. Aguilar in A minor is a very fine work, full of effective contrasts. A bold and impetuous allegro is followed by a flowing cantabile sostenuto in the tonic major, with elegant variations and tenderest modulations. The finale is notable for its nice accentuation, bold left-hand work, and bursts of Beethovian fury. The agreeable recital lasted almost an hour-and-a-half. The second is fixed for Monday, when Schubert's noble Sonata in B major—by some styled the "military" one—is down on the list.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY AT DRURY LANE.

The late Vincent Wallace's opera "Maritana" was first produced at Drury Lane Theatre in 1846, and at once gained the success that it deserved, but which, according to Cato, poor mortals do not invariably command. Mr. Carl Rosa revived "Maritana" last Saturday night, for the début of Miss Amy Sherwin in the title part. This young lady, evidently a novice, is of pleasing presence and has a light but very sweet soprano of extensive range; the mezzo voce is true and clear, and the upper notes of excellent quality. The stage action, as may be supposed, was wanting in colour, but always graceful and unaffected. The most successful points were scored in the two numbers known as "The Harp in the air," and "Scenes that are bright." Miss Sherwin is said to be a native of the United States, but educated—very well educated—in the Old World, as the Eastern hemisphere is still honourably called. In a word, although Miss Sherwin excited no actual furore, she made, nevertheless, a very favourable impression upon her audience. The other parts of the opera were sustained by Mr. J. W. Turner (Don Cæsar), Mr. H. Pope (Charles II.), Mr. L. Crotty (Don José), and Miss Josephine Yorke (Lazarillo). The recalls cannot be computed; enthusiastic encores were won for Lazarillo's song "Alas, those chimes," the fine trio "Turn on, old Time," "Yes, let me like a soldier fall," and "There is a flower that bloometh." The last bis, however, was declined, and very kindly, for these encores are a nuisance to the "wise and prudent."

From another pen are these words:—The production of "Colomba" is another success for all concerned and for English opera. The story of the libretto by Mr. Hueffer, so well-known as a musical editor and prominent critic, is outlined upon the late M. Prosper Merimée's romance, but the librettist has made some considerable alterations in the story and provided an effective opera book. The narrative in its new forms may be briefly stated thus:—The Count de Nevers arrives at Ajaccio as Governor of Corsica, accompanied by his daughter Lydia, and Orso della Rebbia, a Corsican, who has saved the Count's life at Waterloo. Orso is enamoured of Lydia, the Count's daughter, but there is the Corsican custom of the Vendetta, of which Orso is reminded on meeting his sister Colomba. Their father has, they believe, been slain by the Barracini, a feud having long existed between the two families. Orso is embarrassed by the urging of his sister on the one hand, and the dissuasion of his betrothed on the other. The Count induces Orso to accept the avowal by Giuseppe Barracini of his innocence. Colomba indignantly asserts his guilt, and appeals to the Savelli, who was near when the murderous shot was fired and found the dying Della Rebbia, who had just time to trace on a page of his pocket-book the letters "Giuseppe Barra." The renewed exhortations of Colomba determine Orso, who threatens the suspected murderer with vengeance, in the shape of a duel, disdaining the office of secret assassin. A meeting and an altercation between Orso and Giuseppe are cut short by a shot fired at the former from behind a wall by the latter's brother Antonio. Orso's left arm is wounded, but with his other arm he shoots Giuseppe, and, on the appearance of Antonio above the wall, fires again with effect. Chilina and her father, the brigand Savelli, are on the spot, and they hasten to the assistance of Orso, who has fainted. They support the wounded man to their retreat. The Count, Colombo, and villagers find the corpse of Giuseppe, with Colomba rejoicing in the accomplishment of the Vendetta. She and Lydia seek Orso in his concealment among the brigands, the lovers being left alone. Lydia's horror at Orso's supposed crime and her consequent rejection of him are overcome by his narration of the facts; renewed pledges of troth following. Colomba urges them to flight, soldiers being in pursuit. The two lovers determine to remain, Colomba, Chilina, and Savelli going forth in order to divert the attention of the approaching soldiers. The Count enters and undertakes the establishment of Orso's innocence; the lovers' happiness being clouded by the appearance of Colomba, borne in mortally wounded by a bullet from the soldiers. Colomba's dying expression of contentment at the accomplishment of the Vendetta, and the mourning sympathy of the lookers-on, form the final catastrophe of the opera as altered from that of the original narrative. It is to be first noticed with regard to the music, that "Colomba" has no overture, a fashionable omission much to be deprecated as a rule. The Prelude contains some excellent instrumentation, including the Vendetta leit-motiv and a general tendency of the composer to adhere very much to the doctrines of the advanced school. This movement, greatly applauded, was, in obedience to the will of the audience, repeated. The first scene, the Market Place of Ajaccio with an effective distant view of the sea, and much colour and animation, has some clever and brilliant dramatic music, with a solo for the brigand's daughter adorned with some charming instrumental effects. An orchestral incidental piece gives us a taste of what is called "martial music." A love scene, with a charming duet, effective declamatory sentences, and striking instrumentation, are present in this act. The second Act takes place on a village green. It opens with a short prelude of a serious tone, and a scena for Colomba with an effective Allegro, some spirited ballet music with a Saltarello, a Rustic March with ingenious and suggestive orchestration, and some good choral music, are to be found in the setting of this scene. The third Act opens with a road scene, and musically, with a brief prelude. Orso has a scena and a somewhat striking love song is included. Chilina is singing behind the scenes a quaint, old-fashioned ballad. The vigorous dramatic music, the attack upon Orso by the two Barracini and their destruction by Orso, the consternation of the country people, and the impressive sounds of a chanted "Requiem," make up this act. The fourth Act opens with another prelude, and has some pleasing duo movements, with effective if not very original sentences, and affording good opportunities for the excellent dramatic and vocal performance they received. The scene is in a valley. Colomba implores the lovers to escape from the soldiers; she is brought back mortally wounded and the work closes with impulsive and well contrasted musical illustrations. Notwithstanding some good dramatic situations, the gloom of the story and the repulsive notion of a systematically pursued vengeance abhorrent to the ideas of cultured English people, make Mr. Mackenzie's task no light one. His music shows good dramatic instincts and much earnestness, which promise well. He is too apt to be restless in his rhythm and to lack clearness of purpose constructively, faults some people are weak enough to regard as virtues. The orchestration is everywhere artistic and masterly. The composer conducted the performance, and was with the poet, manager, and chief singer called for by the audience to be congratulated upon the success of the work. The parts were well sustained by Mdme. Valleria, Mdlle. Baldi, Miss C. Perry, and Mr. B. M'Guckin, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. F. Novara, Mr. H. Pope, Miss E. Collins, Mr. B. Davies, and Mr. W. Esmond.

Another contributor says:—

On Monday night the second great event of the short season came off. Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, a British composer, produced and conducted his new opera "Colomba," entitled a "Lyrical Drama" (in four acts), founded on Prosper Merimée's tale (a twin sister of "Carmen"), and ably adapted for the stage, in English metrical stanzas, by Dr. Francis Hueffer. The story itself is repulsive enough, and so intricate that it may be well to quote the official "argument" at full length.

Orso Della Rebbia, a young Corsican captain, returns to his native country in the company of the Governor, Count Nevers, and his daughter Lydia, with with whom Orso is in love. He is met at Ajaccio by his sister Colomba, who speedily indicates to him the sole object of her thoughts, viz., that he shall at once execute vengeance on the supposed murderers of their father—the brothers Barracini. But Orso is not disposed to undertake the task without direct proof, and is further dissuaded from it by Lydia. All save the latter proceed to the village of Pietranera, home of the Della Rebbia and Barracini families, whom in the second act the Count endeavours to reconcile. The heads of the houses are about to shake hands, when Colomba steps in, and openly accuses Giuseppe Barracini of killing her father, bringing forward as a witness one Savelli, a brigand, who is able to produce proof of the murder. This satisfies Orso, and he challenges his enemies to meet him in open fight, although he still refuses to seek revenge in cold blood; but in the next act, whilst waiting on the road to meet Lydia, he is accosted by Giuseppe Barracini, and suddenly, at a signal from the latter, Orso is fired at. The shot hits him in the left arm; with the right, he lifts his gun and shoots down Barracini, whose brother, next instant raising his head above the neighbouring fence, receives the contents of Orso's second barrel. Each shot having proved fatal, Orso escapes with the brigand and his daughter into the "macchia," or bush. Hither, in the last act, come Colomba and Lydia, and, after a scene of recrimination and reconciliation between the lovers, the soldiers come to arrest Orso. The Count, however, arrives in time to direct his release, and promises to establish his innocence. Thus Orso and Lydia are made happy, but Colomba has been mortally wounded amid the skirmish with the soldiers, and dies as the curtain falls.

The author of the libretto, in a preface, avows his set "purpose" to discard the existing "Della Cruscan mannerisms of diction in the lyrical drama, as reflected in such "poets" as Bunn and Fitzball, and to write words in accordance with common sense and sound literary taste. Dr. Hueffer has freely introduced lyrical verse forms, with occasional double and triple rhymes, and treated the blank verse "with considerable and intentional liberty." The doctor has also modified the original tale; he kills Colomba in the sequel to meet the requirements of lyrical tragedy, and, in fact, has retained little more than the outline of the story.

The opera is thus cast: Colomba, Mdme. Valleria; Orso, Mr. Barton McGuckin; De Nevers, Mr. W. H. Pope; Savelli, Mr. F. Navara; Chilina (daughter of Savelli), Miss C. Perry; the brothers Barracini, Messrs. Ludwig and W. Esmond; and Lydia, Mdme. Baldi.

I now come to the music. Mr. Mackenzie evidently, if not avowedly, adopts the Wagnerian plan of opera, that is to say, a continuity of subject, as contradistinguished from the old stiff and formal "set-piece" system. "Leit-motifs," too, are aptly used. Reserving a full opinion until after a second hearing, it is only just to the composer to acknowledge a fine, and, in some respects, a powerful work, well conceived, consistently carried out, and consummately "finished." The uninteresting, not to say repulsive plot, makes the opera a heavy affair, and the fourth act may be unhesitatingly denounced as a mistake. When the curtain finally dropped on Monday at ten minutes before midnight, the audience were quite exhausted. The opera might easily be made to end with the vendetta, the sole end and aim of its heroine, the homicidal Colomba.

A short introduction in F minor and major was unwearyingly encored. It is, nevertheless, pretty lively music, with clever modulations, and capitally scored. The chorus of fisherwomen and sailors in G opens the first act, con spirito; an obstinate suspension of the third on the dominant chord (G against A), reminds one of a similar device in the laughing chorus of "Der Freischütz" (same key). The succeeding deliverance of Savelli, the brigand, is a good specimen of richly accompanied recitative, and the key (G minor) invests it with a duly sombre colouring. The pretty "Vocero" of Chilina in E flat, "Gentle dove," with harp obbligato, is noticeable for a transition to C flat at the latter end. The scena between the lovers, Lydia and Orso, which begins in D and changes to F major (with episode in D flat) is a spontaneous, if not eloquent, dialogue in the accepted Wagnerian style of elaborately accompanied recitative; and at "the sweet words, I love you," the couple sing in unison for some bars. At last Colomba enters on a mule, to the tune of F sharp minor, and a graphic general scena ensues, full of dramatic vigour and stir. Colomba now sings a duet with her brother in D minor, a model of fine orchestral writing—(hautboy particularly expressive)—and without any "pull-up." Colomba afterwards sings the end of the "Vocero" (a "leit-motif") in E flat, ascending to G and B flat; and the chorus join in the cry of "Vendetta." A grand quintet and chorus in F, beautifully scored and well worked out, ends the first act.

The other acts are rather shorter. Act II. opens with a dolorous largo for Colomba, "What is my home to me," in E minor and major; the rhythm changes as well as the mode, and high B natural is written as "optional," G has also to be held, and a skip of the diminished seventh in descent occurs, from D natural to E sharp, on the word "swallow." No sensation was here excited. The ballet music in B flat and G sounds rather commonplace; and the hymn in G, "Salve, Regina del Maggio," has (it is presumed intentionally) the same progression of melody, only in different time, as "Alla Trinità Beata" in the "Laudi Spirituali." After a rustic march in E flat comes a quartet in A flat, sung by the Count, Orso, and the brothers Barracini, a smooth suave subject, interrupted by an intrusion of Colomba, whereupon a powerful finale ends the act in E minor. Savelli denounces the two assassins, and Orso resolves to avenge his father. Here may be noted much poetical writing for the strings, and an effective figure drawn.

In Act III., opened by a pretty prelude in G, Orso sings a Corsican love song in G, "Will she come from the hill?" ascending to high G and A. Chilina has a far more beautiful ballad in F sharp minor, "So he thought of his love," certainly one gem of the opera. The scene between Orso and his enemy Giuseppe contains some rather coarse writing, relieved by many passages of elegance. The assassin, threatening Orso with death, sings a scale passage (bass clef) from low F sharp to high C natural, at which note the first shot is fired. The harmony changes hereabouts from four sharps to five flats, and the transitions of tonality are incessant. The "Requiem" hymn of the monks, in G minor (written for tenors and basses in thirds), sounds weak; and Colomba's triumphant shout of "Vendetta" on high B natural, blending with the "Requiem" chorus, hardly compensates for the weakness of the (musical) situation.

Act IV., as before hinted, is tedious and redundant. The duet between Colomba and Lydia, in D minor and major, sung on a dark stormy night, evidently wearied the public, and was hardly redeemed by the splendid vocalisation of Mdme. Valeria. The duet between the lovers, long and laboured, arrests the business vexatiously, although it rises to passionate fervour at the latter end. The key changes from G to E flat minor, E major, and E flat major. The scena ends in E flat minor. The lovers are reconciled, and although arrested for murder by the sbirri, Orso's two shots are held to be fully justified. Colomba, wounded to death, says that "she dies contented," joins the lover's hands, and expires with the (middle) B flat on her lips, and the word "Remember," the sun rising upon the scene; and a short final chorus, terminates the opera in the key of E flat.

"Colomba" was to be repeated on Thursday. A neat pianoforte score is published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. Of Mdme. Marie Roze's successful reappearance in "Faust," on Tuesday night, a few words next week—the last of the season.

SENOR SARASATE'S EVENING CONCERT.

The large and extremely enthusiastic audience assembled to do honour to the great Spanish violinist at St. James's Hall, on April 9th, gave distinct evidence of the high appreciation in which the very distinguished virtuoso is held here. The programme opened with Schubert's delicious "Unfinished Symphony in B minor," well played by what was practically the Philharmonic Society's orchestra, under the bâton of Mr. W. G. Cusins. The hero of the concert then gave Beethoven's violin concerto with such poetical fire, persuasive eloquence, and perfect technicalities of execution as enraptured his listeners. In a fantasia on themes from "Carmen," written by himself, Señor Sarasate gave a display of the various models of phrasing, bowing, double-stopping, and "harmonics," which was truly remarkable; the perfect tune, pure tone, and accuracy in attack of bow and fingers could not be excelled as an exhibition of virtuosity. The nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" came next, and, as ever, claimed the admiration which genius and perfect art demand. As exquisite tone pictures, the most hardened and obstinate admirers of the advanced school must surely confess to the power of their witchery. The popular arrangement of Chopin's "Nocturne" and "Spanish Dances," by Señor Sarasate himself, formed the last group of solos. The wonderful playing skill and fascinating power of the artist again aroused the enthusiasm of a discriminating audience; and, after being recalled at the close of every performance, the listeners now succeeded in getting an extra taste of his splendid control over the "king of the orchestra." Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, spiritedly played, closed the concert. Señor Sarasate has, by general desire, arranged to give a second evening concert on Thursday, April 19th, with the assistance of the same band and conductor, when the programme will include Mendelssohn's "Violin Concerto" and Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

H.R.H. the Prince of Wales has duly applied for, and obtained from the Queen, a charter for the Royal College of Music.

FINSBURY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The Finsbury Choral Association gave a performance of the "Elijah" on the 5th inst., at the Holloway Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes. The remarkable precision and finish with which the choruses were rendered throughout educed well merited applause. Miss Jessie Royd, though possessed of a fairly good voice, was evidently overtaxed in the air "Hear ye Israel," and her general "get up" and operatic style were certainly out of character with the occasion. Madame Florence Winn was particularly successful in the several contralto solos. Her facile and excellent delivery elicited much applause, and a peremptory recall. She has a rich pleasing voice, and sings like a true artist. The singing of Mr. Alfred Kenningham was much appreciated, notwithstanding an apparent attack of hoarseness. Mr. Vaughan Edwardes was scarcely physically or artistically equal to the arduous task of the Prophet, but nevertheless displayed qualities of promise. The accompaniments were exceedingly well played by Mr. Harding on the pianoforte, and Mr. Marchment on the harmonium, and the conductor, Mr. C. J. Dale officiated with his customary ability. The "Creation" is announced for May 17th.

BEDFORD.

The grand concert held at the Assembly Rooms of this town on the evening of April 5th deserves ample notice. It was patronised by the Hon. W. Lowther, M.P., General Mills, and other local "notables." Mr. Polonaski and Mr. Bond Andrews began with a capital rendering of Beethoven's favourite sonata for piano and violin in F major, whereof the scherzo is alway a crux to ordinary performers. Mr. Polonaski afterwards played two violin solos with great taste and finish, to wit, Bach's adagio in C, on the "G" string, and his own "Pensée Fugitive" in E minor, a very poetical effusion. A third piece was the late Henri Wieniawski's "Légende et Mazurka" in G, rather too long for the theme. Mr. Bond Andrews played his own "Grotesque Oriental," No. 2, the "Anglaise," No. 1, "The Return," from the "Maypole," and the "Spinning Song," all characteristic compositions, well conceived and scholastically worked out. Messrs. Polonaski and Bond Andrews finished the concert at half-past ten with Gregoire Leonard's duet on "Tannhäuser," an effective arrangement of the March in B major for piano and violin. Mdme. Aviglioni sang "Batti, batti," and Mr. Charles De Wolfe the serenade of his friend Mr. Bond Andrews, "My lady sleeps."

HIGH WYCOMBE.

On the evening of the 2nd inst. the Choral Association gave their last concert of the season in the Town Hall, before a large audience. The following was the programme:—

"The May Queen"	S. Bennett.
Part-song, "Blanche"	Kucken.
Air, "Love sounds the alarm" ("Acis and Galatea")	Handel.
Pianoforte duet, Slavonic Dances	Dvorak.
Aria, "Non mi dir"	Mozart.
Canon, "Hark to the rolling drum"	Bishop.
Pianoforte Solos—
"Lieder ohne Wörte"	Mendelssohn.
"Gavotte"	Janotha.
Chorus, "Now tramp"	Bishop.

Bennett's charming pastoral is so well known to the readers of the Musical Standard that I need not dwell on its many beauties. The performance was a great treat, the choral portion of the cantata being splendidly sung; nor were the artists less successful, Miss Fenna as the May Queen doing full justice to a most charming part, while Miss Webb as the Queen, Mr. Hodgson as the Lover, and Mr. C. Rose as Robin Hood were equally effective. Miss Fenna gave a splendid rendering of Mozart's exacting air, and in response to an enthusiastic encore delighted everyone with Sullivan's "Let me dream again." Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus.Bac., Oxon., besides conducting, played three of Mendelssohn's Lieder, Nos. 1, 27, and 30, and a charming gavotte by Jules Janotha, which ought to become popular, and with his brother, Mr. W. A. Wrigley, two of Dvorak's Slavonic Dances, which were much enjoyed. The ladies of the chorus won a well deserved encore for Bishop's canon, and a magnificent performance of "Now tramp" brought a most enjoyable concert to a close.

MUSIC IN READING.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

An important movement in Church music here has recently been successfully inaugurated at St. Mary's Church, where Gounod's "Redemption" has been impressively rendered at two special week-day services.

Part I was given on the Tuesday in Holy Week, and Parts 2 and 3 on the Thursday in Easter Week. Large congregations attended the services, and the effect of the music was evidently received as a solemn act of worship. The assistance of members of the Philharmonic Society (by whom the same music was so successfully performed last December), was obtained to form a large special choir, and Mr. Strickland, the organist of the Church, played the accompaniments with a wonderfully good imitation of the orchestral effects, upon the fine four manual organ, by Henry Willis, which the Church fortunately possesses.

I would express the hope that these services may be the first of a series of similar ones, that in Reading, as in other towns of similar resources, the oratorio may be restored to its original purpose.

On Wednesday, 28th ult., Mr. F. J. Read, gave an organ recital at Christ Church, when he played a selection of interesting organ music by Bach, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, &c., artistically and well.

On Wednesday, April 4th, the second subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society was given in the Town Hall, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" being performed with a full orchestra and chorus. The soloists engaged were Mrs. Oswald (substitute for Mrs. F. King), Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Henry Guy; and Mr. Burnett (leader); Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt (organist); and Mr. W. H. Strickland (conductor) occupied their usual posts. The performance was a good one, although one or two choruses went rather unsteadily in some places, and the band occasionally overpowered the soloists; but on the other hand some of the choral numbers were given with a vigorous attack and decided power, and others with appropriate feeling and expression.

Mr. Oswald replaced Mr. King (whose hoarseness necessitated the services of a substitute being engaged the same morning) with considerable success, and I venture to predict that he may become one of the leading exponents of the principal parts in "Elijah." Miss Hilda Wilson also made a most favourable impression, and sang the alto music with great effect. Miss Aylward and Mr. Guy both did their work artistically, and upon the whole, I can fairly call the performance one of the best efforts of the Philharmonic Society.

The Duchess of Wellington and many influential people from the town and neighbourhood were present, but the reserved balconies were not so well filled as they should have been.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

An earnest, practical and sympathetic assemblage of hardworking musicians met in this city on Saturday afternoon last, the occasion being the regular monthly meeting of the Society of Professional Musicians, and the topic for discussion "Local Musical Examinations," propounded by Dr. Henry Fisher, of Blackpool, in a very able speech. There was a lively interest shown in the subject, and a natural curiosity to know to what it would tend. There is not the slightest doubt that the issue will surprise most people and in some quarters perhaps cause consternation; and on the other hand again there are those no doubt who will laugh the scheme to scorn and ridicule the idea, but it cannot be denied that the society is about to take a very important step and one which it is quite competent to carry to a successful issue. Mr. J. Marsden, of Manchester, was voted to the chair, and he in very happy language introduced Dr. Fisher to the meeting.

The following gentlemen, among others, were present: Drs. G. Marsden (treasurer), H. Hiles, Messrs. H. Stevens, C. B. Grundy, J. Thorley, W. J. Young, W. J. Wrigley, and E. Hilton (Manchester); Dr. H. Fisher (Blackpool), A. Alexander, James Dawber (honorary secretary), J. Gaskell and C. D. Mortimer (Wigan); F. Dean (Lancaster), H. Grimshaw, W. D. Hall, F. Haworth, J. J. Monk, and M. Schneider (Liverpool); J. M. Field (Bowdon), R. B. Woodward (St. Helens), T. S. Hill, and W. H. Hunt (Birkenhead). The Council met before the general meeting and elected Messrs. A. Hague and G. F. Grundy of Manchester, members of the Society. Before the chief business of the evening began, Mr. W. D. Hall (Liverpool), was elected by a large majority, a member of the Council, in the room of the late Mr. J. L. Goodwin (Manchester). Dr. Fisher is a fluent speaker and requires very few notes; he hardly ever pauses to think, but having mastered his subject, he seems to have no difficulty in putting into intelligible language what he wishes to impress upon his audience. It was amusing to see the different phases of expression upon each countenance as startling ideas were thrown out one after the other. Astonishment and surprise were written clearly upon every face, in some cases not unmingled with dismay. As each pet scheme, which some one or other was interested in, was knocked over without ceremony by the speaker, nods, winks, and audible expressions of approval or otherwise were flying about with an alacrity quite out of keeping with the seriousness of the subject. The speaker's high estimation of the system pursued by the late Mr. Curwen was very forcible, but too strong and of too much prominence. His illustration of the parents or the maiden aunt being, in the past, the real local examiners, was very good, and his amusing account of the immense amount of time that used to be spent upon the "Battle of Prague" and the fondness of parents for the piece with its effect of big cannons and rattle of artillery was a very good point, well led up to, culminating in the fact that after all, the Pater and Mater were the real local examiners, even in the present day of official local examiners. Dr. Fisher did not spare the local examiners or local secretaries, and explained that he himself was one, so that what he said equally applied to himself as well as to others holding the same capacity. He gave some very hard knocks on this matter, but no doubt they were well deserved. Of one thing there could be no doubt, and that was that the speaker was thoroughly in earnest, but he spoke so quickly and seemed to hurl one thing after another with such precipitation that the listeners were taken quite aback, and in fact it might be said that Dr. Fisher took the wind completely out of the sails of any objector who intended, or was inclined to develop in that direction. One representative of the R.A.M. got up in wrath, anent the rather hard remarks somewhat reflecting upon the local examiners, but this episode was soon forgotten. Some members objected to the speed with which schemes were promulgated by the society, and also as to the youthfulness of the society and its supposed consequent non-standing, but the Secretary explained the society numbered about eighty members, representing a large area, who were all men of some standing, and that the numbers were being added to day by day; it was only by enrolling and carrying out such schemes that the society could expect any locus standi, and the esteem and support of the entire musical profession. That the board of examiners to be constituted will contain men on whom the public can rely, is admissible, and that the examination will command respect, is I think, conclusive. There was a great feeling that what Dr. Fisher said about "why do we require an examiner to be sent down from London?" was very forcible, true, and conclusive. Dr. Hiles' question as to what was the raison-d'être of the society, if it was not to advance the interest of the musician, and how this was to be done if not by practicable work, was very telling, and make an impression, and was a complete answer to the protests of one or two that the society was travelling at too fast a pace. The fact is, as I hinted a fortnight ago, that no one was prepared for the issue following Dr. Fisher's able speech, but his arguments and resolutions swept away all objections there might have been. The chairman, also very quick to resent any trifling with the subject, kept the members strictly to the matter under discussion, and his admirable firmness saved a deal of valuable time.

The Council are to have a special meeting on the 29th inst., to discuss the whole scheme, including the book of questions to be used for the theoretical examination. The developed scheme will then be laid before the members of the society at the regular meeting in May. J. J. M.

It may be of interest to state, that a larger sum of money was received for admission to the last Philharmonic concert than has been taken for any previous concert given by the society since its foundation in 1813.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S RECITALS.

Mr. Walter Bache held a second pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. His first (on November 6th, 1882), was duly noticed at the time. On this occasion Mr. Bache temporarily abandoned his master the Abbé Liszt, and took up texts of Beethoven. He chose the two sonatas known as Op. 31, No. 2, in D minor, and Op. 106, in B flat, a tremendous work for brain and fingers. Mr. Bache played magnificently. An enthusiastic University Wrangler, who was present, said that his alternations of mood and variations of style, according to the requirements of the text, might be likened to a rivulet, a storm in the mountains, and—at last—the sweet voice of a woman. Other pieces were the Rondo à Capriccio in G, "Rage over the last penny," and 32 variations in C minor. Mr. Bache was vehemently applauded. Mr. W. Shakespeare sang excerpts from the well-known "Liederkreis" very charmingly.

THE BROUSIL MATINEES.

At the third "Musical Afternoon" of the family Brousil, on April 5th, Mdme. Wurm and Miss Bertha Brousil began with Beethoven's third sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat, which was admirably interpreted by both artists. The same master's beautiful pianoforte trio in C Minor, Op. 1, No. 3, which "Papa" Haydn so unsuccessfully advised the composer not to publish, concluded the concert at half-past five o'clock. Mdlle. Wurm, the gifted pupil of Mdme. Schumann, and a protégé of Dr. George Grove, greatly distinguished herself at this matinée as a pianist and a composer. After a very effective execution of Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses" in D minor (played out of book), Mdlle. Wurm introduced her own (MS.) sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in G, dedicated to Mdme. Schumann. This fine, and for so young a writer highly creditable work, consists of four movements, viz., an allegro in G, dignified and elaborate, yet never tedious; a quaint and piquant scherzo in C minor, a (too) short andante in E flat, a cantabile as regards form; a sort of chorale or canto fermo for the keyed instrument accompanied by the violoncello in triplets; and a finale in G, a spirited rondo, of which the pretty theme is charmingly varied. The work must be heard again and again; it only occupies in performance the brief interval of twenty minutes. Mdlle. Wurm plays with power and aplomb, and in soft passages displays much of the finesse and elegant humoursome style of her mistress. She has an elastic and delicate touch, yet all the sforzandos are effectively and emphatically enunciated. Full chords and rapid scales are executed with equal force and finish. Mdlle. Wurm's sonata evoked much applause. Mr. J. A. Brousil played the violoncello part in first-rate style.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Our musical season is drawing rapidly to a close, and with the exception of Mr. Ainsworth's Violin Recital on April the 13th, and the Vocal Societies' Invitation Concerts in May, is now almost over as far as concerns any concert of consequence.

Dr. Creser's new work "Eudora," which was performed for the first time in Leeds, on November 28th, last year, will be heard in our Town Hall, on May 1st, when Mr. Albion Alderson's Vocal Amateur Society will give their second invitation concert of the season. Dr. Creser is expected to conduct his own work for the occasion.

Mr. E. Prout's cantata "Alfred," and a selection from Haydn's "Seasons," will be sung at the Newcastle Amateur Vocal Society's second invitation concert, on May 9th, in the Town Hall.

One of the most enjoyable ballad concerts of the season took place in the Town Hall, on March 16th. The vocalists, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mackenzie, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. Maybrick were in their best form, and scored many hearty encores for their excellent singing. Signor Bisaccia, as solo pianist and accompanist, left nothing to be desired. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the evening, was the first appearance of the youthful lady violinist, Miss Maria Schumann, who performed the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and a Fantasia on English airs by Weist Hill, (her excellent violin master) in a manner deserving every praise. Miss Schumann's playing is conspicuous for a rare purity of tone, and true musical feeling. The lady violinist was enthusiastically encored after both pieces.

Notwithstanding the fine weather and many counter attractions, Sullivan's æsthetic opera, performed by D'Oyly Carte's Opera Company, drew a crowded house to the Tyne Theatre, on Monday, April 8th. Miss Ethel McAlpine is a charming Patience, and sings her part admirably. The choruses went well and the orchestra played with spirit and great precision throughout, under the able conductorship of Mr. P. W. Hatton. Sullivan's opera is preceded by a musical farce entitled "Matrimony," composed by Mr. P. W. Hatton. Notwithstanding the music is not free from many reminiscences, it is always pleasing and in accordance with the libretto.

H. W.

Worthing.—The second concert of the Musical Association was held at the Montague Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 4th. The first part was Mendelssohn's "Athalie," and the second part miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Colin Kerr, Mdme. Clara West, and Miss Lottie West; organist, Mr. F. J. Sawyer, Mus. Bac.; pianist, Mr. W. H. Price; reader, Mr. W. F. Fuller, Esq.; conductor, Mr. F. D. Carnell, Mus. Bac. The audience was numerous and the concert altogether a success.

Gresham Hall Brixton, S.W.—At the fortnightly "Musical Evening" of the Surrey County School of Music, held on April 11th, under the direction of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the following artists assisted:—Miss Alma Sanders, Miss Nellie Chaplin, Miss Kate Chaplin (violin), Mr. Asperne Deane (violin), Mr. Joseph Hayes (flute). Vocalists: Miss Evelyn Willoughby, and Mr. Henry Yates. At the pianoforte, Mr. W. E. Stark. The pianofortes were kindly lent by Messrs. Pleyel, Wolff and Co.

Sherborne Abbey.—A concert was given in the Assembly Rooms of the Digby Hotel, on Tuesday evening, in aid of the Abbey Choir Boys' Endowment Fund. The first part consisted of Mozart's 12th Mass (omitting Nos. 5 and 6), with English words, the accompaniments being fairly rendered by an orchestra, which, with the exception of Mr. Ramsay, the leader, was composed entirely of amateurs. The principal vocal parts were taken by Miss May Bell, R.A.M., Mrs. Lyon, Mr. R. W. Mill, and Mr. Witherington. In the second part of the concert (miscellaneous), Miss Bell charmed the audience with her expressive singing, Mr. Mills also gained great applause. The orchestra and chorus numbered nearly 100. The conductor was Mr. G. E. Lyle, organist of the Abbey Church, &c.

Sheffield.—In the presence of a large audience, "Victorian,' a new opera founded on Longfellow's "Spanish Student," was produced last week at the Sheffield Theatre by the Royal English Opera Company. The libretto, which in incident keeps somewhat closely to the poem, is by Mr. J. F. R. Anderson, the composer of the opera being Mr. J. Edwards, who is the conductor of the band, and met with a very cordial reception on entering the orchestra. The overture is tuneful, and there are some skilful choruses and pleasing airs in the opera. As the heroine Miss Lucy Franklein's vocalisation was marked by care and precision, and Mr. Redfern Hollins sang well in the title rôle. The opera, says one writer, in spite of some faults, will probably rank amongst standard English Works.

Oldham.—The Vocal Society's concert, the second of the season, was given recently at the Town Hall. As is usual, the members of the society, with their friends, entirely filled the hall, many finding a difficulty in securing seats. The cantata "Psyche" (Gade) is one requiring a fineness of execution which any but a first-rate choir would find it difficult to produce. The solos were well given throughout, all the parts being amply maintained. The second part of the programme, consisting of glees and songs of a miscellaneous character, was given in the very able manner of which the society is capable. The songs deserving special mention are so numerous that we refrain from particularising, while among the part-songs "The Merry March Breeze," and "Winter Days" met with deserved applause. The solos were sung by members of the society, and the conductor was Mr. Joseph Clafton.

Horns, Kennington.—The Victoria Glee Club of male voices, under the Presidency and Vice-presidency of Drs. J. F. Bridge, and F. E. Gladstone, gave an admirable smoking concert in the above hall on the evening of the 10th inst. The club is making rapid strides in a right direction, singing with much precision and expression. Bishop's name figured conspicuously in the programme, and such names as Pearsall and Beale were not omitted, but the finest performance of the evening was the admirable rendering of Cooke's sterling old glee "Strike the lyre." Great praise is certainly due to the conductor, Mr. W. Sexton. Several songs were contributed. Mr. Bell (of Westminster Abbey), sang in his own artistic style, though his voice on this occasion was not quite under his control. The other soloists were Messrs. Heney, White, Sanderson, and Kersel, all contributing songs which were more or less appreciated, the last named gentleman possessing a splendid tenor voice, but his singing shows a want of voice cultivation and musical declamation. The accompanists were Mr. James Hallé and Mr. Geo. F. Grover.

THE ATHENÆUM, SHEPHERD'S BUSH.—The St. Andrew's Choral Society gave its closing concert of the season, on the 4th inst., and the largeness of the audience allows the thought that the society is flourishing. The conductor, Mr. Kilbey, must have worked hard to get the forces at his disposal to act so well together. A part of Haydn's "Seasons" and a new humorous cantata, by that excellent young musician, Mr. Edmund Rogers, entitled "Beauty and the Beast," constituted the fare provided for the friends and supporters of the society, and to judge from the applause it may be asserted that satisfaction was given. It hardly concerns me to say a word excepting to speak with respect to the cantata. The musicianly skill displayed in a similar cantata, "Blue Beard," to which reference was made last year, predisposed a favourable opinion as to this new work, and the success this new work achieved quite realized our anticipations. Several numbers had to be repeated, including a chorus, a soprano solo, and a recitative for the bass, who of course represented the "Beast." An aria buffa for the bass was also re-demanded, but the request was not responded to. With one exception, a notable one, those who took the soli were unknown to me. The chorus and orchestra alike contributed to make the presentation worthy of the work, which I should like to hear a second time in town, before deciding whether it will be likely to be as popular as the composer's "Blue Beard." That the work of a good musician is apparent throughout, may go without question.

ST. LEONARD'S-ON-SEA.—On Tuesday last a most enjoyable morning concert was given in the Royal Concert Hall, in which the following artists took part:—Violoncello, Mons. J. Hollman; soprano, Miss Beata Francis; contralto, Miss Annie Layton; Messrs. Earnest Cecil and Cecil Traherne; solo pianoforte, Mdme. Mina Gould. Owing to indisposition, the last-named artist was unable to play her solo, but ably assisted in accompanying some of the vocal music. Mr. Arthur L'Estrange kindly consented, at a moment's notice, to play in her stead, and performed with great brilliancy and taste a composition of his own ("Chant des Matelots.") Mons. J. Hollman played in magnificent style a Nocturne of Chopin and a Mazurka by Popper; and in the second an Andante and Finale in A minor (Goltermann). Miss Annie Layton sang with much expression Barnby's pretty song, "When the tide comes in," and also "The three singers," by Berthold Tours. A melodie religeuse "Ave Maria" (Gounod), Bach, sung by Miss Beata Francis, with charming 'cello obbligato by Mons. J. Hollman, was excellently rendered. The other vocalists, Mr. Ernest Cecil and Mr. Cecil Traherne, were both very well received. Special mention may be made of Mdme. Mina Gould's new duet for equal voices, "Eyes," which was sung with much taste by these gentlemen, and also of the pretty song entitled "Stay," by the same composer, in which Mr. Ernest Cecil's fine voice was heard to great effect. It is much to be regretted that such an exhibition of talent was so poorly patronised, and the thinness of the audience seems to speak badly for the appreciation of really good music in such a large place as St. Leonard's. It is, indeed, surprising that such a distinguished artist as Mons. J. Hollman should have to appear before an audience of about only fifty persons, when there should have been hundreds, but those who were fortunate enough to be present last Tuesday afternoon will not soon forget his superb playing, and it is to be hoped that when he next visits St. Leonard's the Royal Concert Hall may be crowded in every part.

The Leeds Orchestral Society gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," at the Church Institute, on Monday evening. The principal vocalists were Miss Hoyle, Miss Lupton, Mr. G. Wadsworth, and Mr. J. Atha. Mr. W. H. Hanson conducted. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included the March from "Tannhäuser."

It is stated that Sir Michael Costa has sent to the Naples Conservatorium, in which institution he completed his musical education, an autograph copy of his opera "Malek-Adel," accompanied by the following letter:—"This opera of "Malek-Adel," composed and copied by me, was represented for the first time in the Italian Opera at Paris, in the Salle Favart, in 1837. After the fire that destroyed that theatre my score was almost miraculously found under the smoking ruins, partly consumed by fire. Having been asked to make a gift of another manuscript to the Royal College of Music in Naples I have re-written that score, and offer it with pleasure to the celebrated archives of the college.—London, 20th March, 1883.—M. COSTA."

ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS AND KEY-BOARD MANNERISMS.

VI.

IN the transference of orchestral music to either the pianoforte or the organ key-board, there is nothing deserving of more consideration than the careful comparison of the different mannerisms of tone production. It is quite certain that very little of the tone-colour powers of the orchestra can find any representation on the pianoforte, and in truth the tone-colour of the band is but feebly reflected on the organ; still the key-board performers may with more success imitate the orchestral methods of tone pronunciation, and thereby convey through the power of imaginative association, something of the enunciation and phrasing of the orchestral masses. Yet it must be confessed that too little attention has been turned in the direction of a studied comparison of orchestral versus key-board mannerisms of tone-speech or pronunciation. It may be broadly said that the imperfectly trained performer on any instrument merely produces or plays the notes, but the artistic executant fulfils three conditions in connection with every produced sound: he takes care to effect a true, sharp point of attack; he firmly maintains the sound during its exact time value, and he takes pains to secure a well defined termination or point of departure to the given sound. Now, the study of the comparative modes of enunciation to be observed in the pronunciation of orchestral and in the tone production of key-board instruments, may be based upon these three essential tone conditions, attack, duration, and termination. Though the tone-producing methods of the orchestra are broadly distinguished by the methods of setting strings and tubes in the act of tone formation, there are numerous modes by which the sound producing conditions are fulfilled. It may be observed here, that much of the life of an orchestral instrument depends upon its self-justification in the three-fold direction of attack, duration, and termination. All instruments fulfil the first-named condition of attack more or less satisfactorily, but some fail in the second and third, as do the harp and pianoforte, in having limited or weak powers of tone duration, and a consequent feeble or uncontrollable method of terminating their sounds. It is the failure of the harp as regards the want of a full power of tone duration, and the subsequent faculty of a sharply defined termination of its sounds, which limits its usefulness and keeps it in the orchestral background, so to speak. The pianoforte gains on the harp, not only through its exquisitely sensitive touch, but by its fuller powers of tone duration. To the organ, with its artificial wind supply and fixed wind pressures, must be assigned the credit of best fulfilling the second of the three conditions of sound production, the power of an even tone sustentation; hence its calm dignity. The bowed instruments have splendid faculties of attack and termination, and only a little less satisfactory power of tone duration. The orchestral wind instruments have well defined powers of attack, excellent powers of tone duration, and perhaps a somewhat less satisfactory command of the terminating points of the notes produced. The history of the orchestra is, quite apart from questions as to the value of given tone qualities, indeed the oft-told story of the "survival of the fittest." In the string family we see the old fashioned six-stringed members of the family, with their want of a strong, nervous power of attack, dismissed at quite an early period in the history of what may be called the modern orchestra. Similarly certain members of the flute and other wind families, producing their tones in such compasses as least suited their peculiar embouchure powers of attack, passed away from the roll-call of the orchestra. And the orchestra of our day is simply a collection of the best tone-producing members of the several instrumental types. Only those instruments in fact which are prepared to do earnest, nervous, expressive work have been able to hold their own; and their test of prolonged life has been technically their well developed faculties for the fulfilment of the three-fold tone producing conditions spoken of as the several functions of attack, duration, and note termination.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

VI.

"IT is permitted," says CHERUBINI, still dealing with four-part counterpoint of the first species, "to pass to "a perfect concord by direct movement between any "two of the three lower or the three upper parts, "this permission not being extended to the relationship between the two extreme parts, unless such "progressions are absolutely unavoidable." In truth it is no longer possible to avoid passing perfect concords when the vocal score has attained to the number of four or more parts; and it may be remarked that in a fuller harmony, the ear is neither able to trace out passed perfect concords very definitely or consequently any longer conscious of disagreeable effects arising from their presence. It is however still advisable to treat the external parts strictly in this respect, for they outline the moving mass of harmony. With regard to the passing of perfect concords between the two outside parts, it may be noticed that as the bad effect of such progressions is sensibly minimised by the presence of the internal and sympathetic harmony, it is not so large a fault to pass perfect concords in the movements of external parts as it is to permit the presence of such faulty progressions in thin, clear, and palpably transparent two-part counterpoint. Sometimes, too, it happens that the compass of either the soprano or bass part (especially the range of the lower voice) will make it necessary in some positions of the chords to allow passed fifths or octaves between external parts in order to avoid sending the upper part too high or the lower part too low, in endeavouring to escape from covered consecution. The theorist next points out that "the complete common chord "should occupy the first bar, but if this arrangement "will prevent a subsequent and desired flow of the "various contrapuntal melodies in action, then it "would not be wrong to lead off with an incomplete "chord." CHERUBINI even thinks that license in this direction may be carried to the length of allowing all the parts to start from one note sounded in two or three octaves. However, such a liberty could be rarely called for. The observations just made have a direct application to the last bar. It is not without interest to again note, especially with regard to the last bar, that the old masters frequently terminated a piece even in four parts (and apart from any harmonic reason in connection with chords having minor thirds), with a chord lacking its third, while modern composers partly impelled by the cadence form involving the double progression of the leading-note and dominant minor seventh to the key-note and its third, very frequently elect to terminate a movement with a chord having no fifth in it. It seems, the ancients preferred the solid strong effect of the fifth to the sacrifice of the third, while moderns on the other hand choose by preference the sweet sensitive sound of the third to the sacrifice of the firm, strength-giving fifth. This matter might be enlarged upon, as illustrative of the two musical types in which truthful severity and luxurious sweetness have their distinct reigns in the philosophy of the art.

The first festival of the Bloomsbury Church Choir Union will take place at St. Giles-in-the-Fields Church, in Broad Street, at the Oxford Street end of Tottenham Court Road, on Thursday, April 19th, at 8. The music will include Smart's Service in F, one of Haydn's motets, and the "Hallelujah" chorus from the "Messiah". The clergy, organists, and choristers of the important district represented, have taken an active interest in the new and useful association, and the Bloomsbury Church Union should have the sympathy of all interested in Church music.

"Robin Hood," Herr Dietrich's new opera, has been produced at Cassel.

Eugene d'Albert has given four piano recitals in Dresden with great success.

The new theatre at Prague will open on May 1st with Massenet's "Hérodiade."

A new Mass by Signor Montanelli was recently heard with critical commendation at Pisa.

Le Guide Musical contains a short biographical sketch of Marcella Sembrich, the well-known cantatrice.

Herr R. Franz is suffering from deafness and paralysis of both hands. All will sympathise with the eminent song writer.

Ponchielli's "Miserere," and a "Salve Regina," by Carlotta Ferrari, are among the tokens of a revived interest in church music in Italy.

Fraülein Marianne Brandt, the celebrated German singer, has received gold medals from the Grand Duke of Weimar and the Duke of Sachsen-Altenburgh.

Verdi says "Iago" or "Othello" is not yet written down, though it is asserted that the representative Italian composer has spent much thought upon the proposed work.

Signor T. Mabellini has been nominated Commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy; Signori Gialdino Gialdini, Giovanni Quirici, and Francesco Paoli Tosti have been honoured by similar nominations to different Orders.

It is stated that the principal works at the National Festival at Ghent this year will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Gevaert's "Super Flumina Babylonis," a new composition by Samuel, and Waelput's "Cantate de la Pacification."

It is said that an English lady—Mrs. Florence Steward—is the composer of "La Regina di Scozia," an opera lately produced in Italy with success. The lady was the composer of "Suocera," an attractive operetta produced a few years ago at Naples.

"Mademoiselle Dynamite" is the title of a new comic opera awaiting production, words and music by M. Paul Courtois. Notwithstanding the painfully suggestive title, the action does not take place in our day, but is dated for the year 1803, at Bethencourt-sur-Mer.

At Berlin, according to annual custom on Good Friday, the members of the Singakademie, assisted by the Philharmonic Band, gave a performance of Graun's oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu." The large audience showed that the work is still as attractive as ever, though first produced as far back as the 26th March, 1755, in the Berlin Cathedral.

A wish has often been expressed, in our own columns and elsewhere, that the musical authorities at the Universities would arrange to give practical instruction to undergraduates intending to take Holy Orders, and we have therefore great pleasure in announcing that a scheme of this sort is being put forward with the sanction of the Board of Musical Studies at Cambridge. The lectures are to be given by Dr. Garrett, who as a composer, teacher, and organist, is well known beyond the limits of the University city, and the object of the course is stated to be "to convey such musical information as shall enable clergymen to exercise intelligently the large influence on the cultivation of music in the parish schools and its employment in the services of the church which usually attaches to their position.' No previous technical knowledge will be assumed. The following subjects will be treated in the course:—Construction of the scale, grammar, and notation of music, methods of elementary musical instruction for the primary school, choir training, speaking and singing, intoning, chanting, Anglican and Gregorian chants, hymnology, service music, anthems, accompaniment. Gentlemen who desire to attend are requested to leave their names, as soon as possible, with Messrs. Deighton, Bell, and Co., Trinity Street, who will also receive the fee (one guinea and a half) for the course. The musical resources of the University will thus be brought to bear upon a really practical object, and it is to be hoped that the effort will meet with the success which it deserves.—Church Bells.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. W. G. Wood was the solo organist on April 7th. His first piece was Merkel's Sonata in G minor, a fine organ work, well handled by the player. Wely's Fantasia Pastorale enabled Mr. Wood to display his great skill in producing effective combinations. The organist's three Canons (andante, allegretto, and allegro), proved to be very effective, especially the last of the set, and they were well received. The skill, contrapuntal talent, and courage of the composer in presenting his thoughts in so difficult a form as that of the canon deserves special recognition. A selection from "Faust" as an offering to popular taste, produced much effect, and was excellently played; further, it must be conceded that there are many sentences in "Faust" which lend themselves advantageously to organic treatment. Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C was omitted for want of time. Weber's overture to "Oberon" was capitally played and received with much applause. Mr. Chaplin Henry sang "Speed on," H. Leslie Elliott's "To the clouds," "The song of Hybrias" and "The Vicar of Bray." Mr. Woodhouse played as his violoncello solos "Souvenir de Spa" (Servias), admirably executed, and "Tarantella" (Popper). The pianist was Mr. C. S. Macpherson. Mr. W. S. Hoyle plays to-night. His programme is an interesting one, including a Sonata for organ by the talented young composer, Mr. C. T. Speer, and his own musicianly minuet and trio. On the 23rd, Haydn's "Creation" is to be performed under the direction of Mr. W. McNaught, with orchestra. It is extremely gratifying to note the efforts made by the committee of the Institute in thus presenting choral works with orchestra, in addition to their other efforts in fostering a love of good music. One is inclined to regret that so earnest and energetic a body of managers cannot be invited to manage some of our other concert-giving institutions for us, as well as control the performances given in the famous East-end concert-room, the fortunes of which they guide so well and to such good artistic results.

PLYMOUTH.

The first of a series of bi-weekly recitals on the grand organ in the Guildhall was given recently by Mr. John Hele, the borough organist. The recital was announced for half-past three, and precisely at that hour the Mayor (Mr. Shelly) ascended the orchestra accompanied by a number of gentlemen of local influence. The audience was a very numerous one. The Mayor remarked that he had been asked to explain before the recital commenced what the arrangements were which had been made by the Corporation in order that the people of Plymouth might, as far as possible, enjoy the music of the organ which, as they all knew, had been presented to the town. Mr. Hele had recently been appointed to that position, and the Corporation believed they had in that gentleman a most capable musician, and one who would give great pleasure and satisfaction to the town by his performances. It had been arranged that on Thursday afternoons at half-past three there should be an organ recital, and in order that everyone might have an opportunity of hearing the music the arcades would be free to the public on those afternoons, while a charge of twopence and threepence would be made for admission to the body of the hall and balcony respectively. On Saturday evenings it was intended that there should be popular recitals, with vocal and organ and other instrumental music. It was hoped that really good, interesting, and valuable music would be made increasingly popular, and that a new and lasting source of enjoyment and, he might add, of instruction, might be opened up to the people of Plymouth. It was the earnest desire of the Corporation that in this way the organ should be made as useful as possible; and it was, at the same time, their hope that the people of Plymouth would more and more appreciate the musical enjoyment and instruction which would thus be provided for them. Mr. Hele then proceeded with the organ recital, and performed several selections with much taste, opening with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and concluding with "A March," by Best. The programme was not a "popular" one in the ordinary sense of the term, but the selections were from works of the best known composers, and Mr. Hele did every justice to the occasion, the abilities of the organist and the great merits of the organ being both displayed to the fullest extent.

The Theatre for April has excellent photographs of Mrs. Kendal and Mr. W. S. Bennett, so long associated with Mr. A. S. Sullivan. The musical news, contributed by Mr. W. Beatty-Kingston, contain interesting paragraphs about Wagner and the late esteemed pianist Leopold de Meyer. The general contents are of the usual excellence and value.

THE POSITION OF THE CHOIR AND ORGANS IN CHURCHES.

The choir of Ratisbon Cathedral, which is justly celebrated all over Europe for its efficiency, consists of two separate bodies of voices, one composed of clergy, theological students, etc., who are placed in the stalls in front of the altar, and sing the plain chant; and the other of professional singers, who sing the harmonised music, and are stationed in the apse, behind the high altar. The organ is immediately behind the reredos: it is a small but singularly good instrument, so far as it goes. Above the stalls, on either side of the choir, are stone galleries bracketed out, which are reserved for the use of the clergy of distinction who are unconnected with the cathedral; this seems to me to be a very excellent idea,—one which might well be adopted in other places,—because it obviates a difficulty. Strangers ought never to be admitted into the stalls of a cathedral under any condition whatever; yet it is desirable to have some place for foreign ecclesiastics visiting the church. While I was at Ratisbon I noticed that one of these galleries was occupied by an Armenian bishop and his attendants. I must here call attention to a somewhat remarkable but very successful experiment which was made at this cathedral some years back. The plan of the cathedral is remarkably symmetrical, and when it was restored, numerous positions for the professional choir and the organ were suggested. Both were removed from place to place to discover where they would be most effective. The organ, which is, as I have said, a small instrument, was found to be totally insufficient everywhere, except when placed in the apse, where, owing to some extraordinary acoustic properties of the building, it has the effect of a large and powerful instrument. It was also discovered that the same effect was produced by the choir, so that a body of some twenty voices was found to produce the effect of a very large choir; it was, however, found necessary to play and sing the music very much slower than it would be ordinarily taken; a false note or a breakdown would, of course, be multiplied fourfold, and what would be the result of a cypher on the organ I tremble to think. Such things, however, do not happen with the Ratisbon choir, and I do not think that anything could surpass the superb unaccompanied music of Palestrina as rendered by this choir and in this cathedral; it seems to wind round and about the lofty columns and in and out of the stately arches in a way that baffles all description. I went to the church over and over again before I could discover where these grand waves of harmony proceeded from. This is the only case I known of in which the choir and organ have been placed and arranged with a view exclusively to the acoustic properties of the building, and yet one would naturally have expected to find such a proceeding rather the rule than the exception. The arrangement of organ and choir behind the high altar is not uncommon in France, and wherever I have heard it, the musical effect is remarkably good.

In cruciform churches one of the transepts is an admirable position for the organ. A very fine and effective instrument has been erected in the south transept of Worcester Cathedral.

The aisles of a church are not a good situation for organs without they are like those in the German churches—remarkably lofty. Ancient organs in this position are to be found at St. Afra, Augsburg; at St. Stephen's, Vienna; at Norlingen, in Suabia; at Ingolstadt, in Bavaria; and at the Cathedral of Erfurth. The organ-lofts in each of these cases are very charmingly designed; all these churches, however, possess an organ at the West end in addition to that situated in the aisles. There is a gallery at the west end of the north aisle of Winchester Cathedral which was probably formerly an organ-loft, though we know that the principal organ of that church stood on the rood-loft. Another very favourable ancient position for the organ was in a gallery bracketed out from the triforium of the nave. The ancient organs at Chartres, Freiburg, and Strasburg are in this position, and in all probability the so-called minstrels' gallery at Exeter was nothing more than an organ loft. We know also that, in addition to four organs in different parts of the church, Durham Cathedral had an organ corbelled out from the triforium of the nave. Although it is a fairly-good position for a moderate-sized organ, yet it has several drawbacks; the organ is generally too high up to be quite satisfactory, either for accompaniment or as a solo instrument. Undoubtedly an organ sounds better when raised above the level of the heads of the congregation, but some of its tones must be lost when it is raised some 50 ft. or 60 ft. above the pavement.

Old organs were very frequently placed over the choir-stalls. That of the old Cathedral of St. Paul was in this situation, and the Cathedral of Milan and many Spanish and Italian churches are examples in point. Unless, however, the choir projects west of the transepts, so that the organ can stand under one of the arches of the crossing, there is scarcely sufficient space for a modern organ of large dimensions, and it has led to the very objectionable practice of cutting the organ in half, and placing one half on one side of the choir and the other half on the opposite side, the two being connected by trackers underneath the floor. It is useful, however, sometimes, to have a small organ over the stalls when there is a large organ in another part of the church. This is the case at Worcester Cathedral.

We sometimes, though very rarely, find old organs placed on the ground to the east of the stalls, and it is to be remarked that the only pre-Reformation organ-case existing in England, that of New Radnor Church, is in this position. Occasionally the organ is placed on a gallery at the back of the altar. Handel's organ at Whitechurch is in this situation; both organ-case and choir-gallery were designed by Wren. In some of the Lutheran churches in Germany the organ is over the altar. It is so at St. Anne's, Augsburg, but there the altar is the intruder, as the fine old organ holds its original position at the west end of the church, and a modern altar is placed under it. I think it was at Ludwigsburg I saw a singular three-decker arrangement,—not pulpit, reading-desk, and clerk's desk, as one sometimes sees in England,—but an altar below, a pulpit immediately above the altar, and an organ above the pulpit.

It is now customary to place the organ in a chamber at the side of the chancel. I find that this arrangement is almost universally condemned by musicians, and especially by organists. A correspondence upon the subject has recently taken place in the Musical Standard, and the veto was strongly against these structures. A very eminent organist lately told me that it was about as bad a position as could possibly be found for an organ, and for his part he would as soon see the organ placed out on the opposite side of the street. I will here relate the objections to organ-chambers which I have heard advanced. (I am not now giving you my own opinions, but that of those who are far more able to judge of the matter). It is advanced that an organ, like all other musical instruments, requires to be placed in an open and isolated position, and that it should never be inclosed or surrounded, except by its own case. We know that when a good pianist wants his instrument to sound well, he draws it away from the wall, and opens the top, so that there shall be nothing to intervene between the instrument and his audience. And it is even more important that an organ should be unencumbered by surrounding objects than a piano, because the organ consists of at least two parts or subdivisions, the most important of which is called "the great organ," and the less important "the swell organ." Now the characteristics of "the great organ" should be power, grandeur, and distinctness of tone, and the "swell" should be more subdued, sweet, and gentle, with a contrivance for producing variety as to piano and forte. The contrast between the various portions of an organ form one of its greatest merits as an instrument, and these contrasts are affected by certain mechanical means. The "great organ," for instance, demands a clear space to give forth its majestic tone, the "swell" requires to be inclosed, but to be able, when wanted, to break away from this inclosure and give forth a fine crescendo. This is effected by a contrivance somewhat resembling Venetian blinds. If there is a choir-organ it should be clear, delicate, and very sweet in tone. Now, when the whole thing is shut up in a box,—and an organ-chamber is really little else,—much of this wonderful contrast is gone, because the very conditions demanded by the instrument are unfulfilled. But some people may say, "Oh, I like the subdued tone of the organ, and cannot bear to hear it when it is loud." An unfortunate organist wrote to the Musical Standard a few days back that he was absolutely forbidden by the clergyman to play any but soft voluntaries on the instrument, and was ordered not to play Bach's fugues because the same clerical authority considered them "undevotional"! Now to such people as this what I should say is, "Why on earth go to the expense of a powerful organ, when, for 8*l*., you can get a harmonium which will be better suited to your taste, or want of taste?" It is surely folly to pay for grandeur of tone and power, and then shut them up in a box where they cannot be heard. Yet this is very frequently done. I have often heard really good organs crammed into organ-chambers, which have, from their unfortunate position, had little more effect than a harmonium. Sometimes, to make matters worse, the organ-chamber will be enclosed by low arches and screens of wood or stone,—all forming a carefully-constructed sound-trap or gag. The fact is, that when the organ is placed in an organ-chamber, the "great organ" is reduced to becoming a "swell organ," without the power of producing diminuendo, or crescendo. As a rule, also, organ-chambers are far too small to hold an efficient instrument, and the various parts have to be crowded together, and this is always bad. Mr. E. Turpin, writing in the Musical Standard, gives 20 ft. by 20 ft. by 20 ft. as the smallest sounding-space for a church organ; yet how few organ-chambers are of these dimensions. Another defect in organ-chambers is the fact that they are nearly always damp. Now, damp is sure to ruin an organ. Then, also, an organ is difficult to get at when blocked up in a chamber. It is most important that every part of an organ should be easy of access, otherwise it may be absolutely necessary to take down nearly the whole of an organ to remedy some trivial defect which an organist himself could easily rectify if he could obtain access to that part of the instrument where the defect lies. The great organ at the Bois-le-Duc is admirably arranged in this respect, being furnished with a staircase and galleries inside.

From an artistic point of view much has been lost by the organ chamber, which is nearly always an ugly adjunct to a church. Directly organs are relegated to the chamber they no longer come under the attention of the architect, and that singularly-beautiful article of church furniture, the organ-case, is abandoned. But as long as the organ occupies an important position in the building, the case must be carefully designed; and when one sees how magnificently the Mediæval and Renaissance men treated that architectural feature, one cannot help wondering why it so rarely receives any attention at the present time. There are, I am glad to say, some few exceptions, and fine cases have been erected at Worcester, Hoare Cross, and Manchester, and have been designed for St. Margaret's, Westminster, and St. Martin's, Brighton. It is, however, very strange that, as a rule, the only portion of an organ which it is attempted to decorate is the pipes. This is certainly a work of superogation, because the pipes of an organ are sufficiently handsome in their natural condition; whereas the deal-posts and match-boarding, which generally do duty for a case, would certainly be none the worse for what our Yankee cousins call "a lick of paint." If people are very rich and anxious to spend money upon an organ, they should have the pipes embossed. One paints iron to prevent rust, but it seems repugnant to one's feeling to paint tin. I do not, however, propose to detain you by remarks upon the artistic treatment of organ-cases, because this subject is dealt with in a very complete manner by Mr. A. G. Hill, who, in his work upon the organ,—about to be published,—has illustrated and described all the most important examples at present existing in Germany, Holland, Belgium, France, England, and some few even in Italy and Spain. Most of these are reproduced from Mr. Hill's own sketches. By rare good luck Mr. Hill has also become possessed of many curious engravings of old organ-cases now destroyed. To the artistic value of the work he has been able to add much practical information gathered from personal experience as a partner in the well-known firm of Hill & Sons,—which is, I believe, the oldest firm of organ-builders in England.

I now come to the question, "What is the best position for an organ in a church?" And in consulting several eminent organists, I have nearly always received the following reply to the question:—"Either some central position as much isolated as possible, or a western gallery." Now, the objection to a western gallery is, that although it is admirable for sound, people, and especially the Anglican clergy, are opposed to having the choir so far removed from the altar. But I venture to think that the central position might be managed. It certainly suggests a choir-screen of some kind or other; and why should not the choir-screen be constructed in the form of a solid arch or bridge crossing the eastern bay of the nave. This need not occupy any space upon the ground-floor of the church, because the nave benches might be continued under it to its eastern extremity, or the choir might be carried on to its western extremity. If the first plan were adopted the organist would sit in the gallery above the arch; but if the latter were carried out he would play from the west end of the choir-stalls, under the arch. I have ventured to show how this arrangement might be carried out. It may be objected that this scheme gives very great prominence to the organ. But I would ask, why should not an organ occupy a very prominent position in a church? It generally costs more than all the rest of the church furniture put together. It is, as I have shewn, becoming every day a more and more important adjunct to divine worship. It is capable of the highest artistic treatment and architectural development. Why, then, should it not be brought boldly forward and placed in a situation worthy of the king of instruments? In the Middle Ages the organ was regarded with the most extraordinary reverence, and we find St. Peter Damian, in his exquisite hymn "De Gloria Paradisi," enumerates the tones of the organ among the joys of heaven. Now, it so thoroughly describes what an earthly choir ought to be that I venture to quote it:—

"Novas semper harmonias,
Vox melodа concrepat;
Et in jubilum prolata
Mulcent aures organa."

("Lovely voices make a concert,
Ever new and ever clear;
And in never-ending festal
Organs soothe the ravish'd ear.")

CARDIFF.

A concert was recently given at St. John's Schoolroom, Crockherbtown, under the Presidency of the Rev. C. J. Thompson, vicar of St. John's, the financial object being to aid the fund for the enlargement of the parochial schools. There was a large audience, and it was evident that the announcement that Mr. Brinley Richards had kindly consented to take part in the proceedings had had due effect. After several pieces had been given, the Chairman called upon Mr. Brinley Richards to address them. The distinguished musician at once came forward, and was heartily applauded on proceeding to speak from the platform. He expressed the pleasure which he felt in responding to the invitation to attend. He said:—

This being my third, and probably my last, visit to Cardiff, as the official representative of the Royal Academy of Music, I wish to make some remarks concerning the Local Examinations. I may at once state that the results justify me in making a favourable report of the progress of musical education of Cardiff. I congratulate myself in having had the valuable assistance of Mr. Frederick Atkins, for whom I entertain the respect due to an earnest and intellectual musician. I may describe Mr. Atkins as a jewel in a very unpretentious setting, and if he has a fault, it is that he is too apt to efface himself, and so far does himself an injustice. But I beg to assure him that the hours I have passed with him during the examinations will always be to me a very pleasant memory. To the candidates who are present this evening I would speak as a fellow-student, for though my life has been devoted to music, I still consider myself a student. If we are willing to learn there is no time of life that we may not do so. The best and wisest of us can never live to be more than students, for there is no art, no science, that has yet been perfected. And so with the Divine art of music, with which you of late have been exercising yourselves. The great giants of the art—whose works are left to us as legacies of inestimable value—would tell you, were they here to-night, how far they were from accomplishing perfection. Believe me, this great perfection of all things is reserved for our eternal future, and not to be achieved in this world; and, therefore, our minds are naturally directed to that glorious Heaven to which we all hope, when this student's career of ours is finished, to attain. And now, my young friends—especially those of you whose fingers and brains have been exercised of late in getting up the test pieces which have been so carefully set forth by the Royal Academy for this year's study—I doubt not that most, if not all of you, have studied the whole of the works, and not merely the two which you have had the option of selecting for yourselves. You who have studied the whole will have observed how judicious that selection has been—how every example of technique in the art has been illustrated so far as it was practicable. In fact, the Royal Academy has set before you examples of every style except that which is vulgar—examples which, if you study thoughtfully and dilligently, must eventually train your mind to thoroughly enjoy and appreciate all that is beautiful in the art. Believe me that it is of the highest importance what should, or should not, be placed before you for your study and practice—your tastes as well as your fingers have to be educated. Now, had I looked into the music folios a little while ago I doubt not but that I should have found much there that would not have commended itself to the thoughtful and educated musician, and so far you will agree with me, that the Academy has done much for you if it has only set you on the right course of study to become truly educated musicians. And this question, "What is study?" is of immense importance. You may eke out your hour at the piano and accomplish nothing, just as it is possible to wade through volumes of books without acquiring one crumb of solid information. Printers and publishers are responsible as much for the trashy music in circulation as the heaps of trashy books that waste and squander away the youthful hours. Nay, more than waste, they corrupt. Now, there is some difference between amusement and study, although both may be combined. But your practice at the piano, if it has not helped you over some difficult passage or passages, has done little or nothing for you as a student pushing onwards, and I think the Royal Academy has helped both you and your teachers, if they be teachers worthy of the name! and as it is the natural tendency in youth to read light books because they require no effort of the mind, so young pianoforte students, too, catch at the light and frivolous in music for the same reason, as it requires scarcely any care to watch the stuff which many still play, and still less study. Now, these examinations have done all this; they have backed up your teachers against the natural inclination to idle stuff, and they have defined in what they have set before you as proper models for study and practice, and as your ear becomes trained (and it is an organ that can be tutored as well as any other) the more will be your enjoyment of the beauties of such great masters as Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and others, and it will be your duty, as far as you can, to educate others in the same way, not by stooping or pandering to their taste, which has probably not been trained, but to endeavour to raise them to your standard, inasmuch as you have been taught. It is gratifying to see so many ladies going in this year for paper work, and it is moreover somewhat encouraging to the principal and committee of management, who have your interests at heart, for without attention to this department pianoforte playing is reduced to a mechanical operation. The committee have undertaken these examinations purely for the advancement of the art in every part of the kingdom, and the results have been most gratifying. It is the only way open that could possibly reach the masses, and ultimately raise popular taste, and although this is only the third year for these examinations the effect produced has been manifest in every town where the Academy has been operating. The concert was then proceeded with.

The Leeds Express treats upon the life and labours of Dr. W. Spark at considerable length in an article, No. 7 of "Local Celebrities," in issue of April 7th.

THE ORGAN FOR BEVERLEY MINSTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—As a native of Beverley, I wish to endorse the opinion of "One of the Old School" as to the necessity of retaining Snetzler's old work—all that is left of it, if still good and suitable—in the proposed new organ for the Cathedral of that hopelessly dull old town. The wise resolve to replace the organ on the screen, will not, it may be hoped, be abandoned at the last moment; for what other position can compare with it for a Cathedral organ; A handsome case it ought to have, and I am surprised to hear that His Grace of York, who is, I believe, a good musician, should have recommended only "a bare array of pipes." In his own Cathedral of York, the finest in England, the magnificent organ built (on the screen) by Messrs. Hill & Son, would surely demonstrate to His Grace, the advantage and beauty of having even in a smaller Cathedral a large but compact organ, enshrined in a rich case and placed in the position of all positions.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

OLD SCHOOL.

Passing Events.

A new opera by Mr. Silas G. Pratt entitled "Zenobia," was produced at McVicker's Theatre, Chicago, U.S., during the past month.

Mr. W. M. Hutchison is announced as engaged in the composition of a humorous cantata having the title of "H.R.H." The words were written by Mr. Edward Oxenford.

A series of highly interesting articles on the treatment of the word "Amen," from the pen of that learned musical critic, Mr. W. A. Barrett, may be read in the pages of the Musical Review.

Those who wish to do an obliging and useful man a good turn, and to listen to a pleasant miscellaneous concert at the same time should attend the benefit concert of Mr. Frank Norman, Hall Manager at the Neumeyer Hall, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, on Wednesday next, the 18th inst. The artists include the Misses Ellis Walton, M. Gwatkin, A. Sanders, Mdme. E. Roberts, Messrs. John Cross, H. Carter, H. E. Cooke, and F. Sewell Southgate.

An excellent and useful musical institution, the Clapham Amateur Orchestral Society, gave an excellent concert, on April 11th, at the Kensington Town Hall, in aid of the British Home for Incurables, Clapham Road. The vocalists were Miss Thudicum, Miss Orridge, and Mr. A. Oswald; the conductor was Mr. Ammon Winterbottom. The programme included Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony in B minor," and the overtures "Die Felsenmühle," (Reissiger), and "Merry Wives of Windsor" (Nicolai).

Lincoln's Inn Chapel was reopened on Sunday last, after being closed since August 1881 for enlargement and restoration. The musical part of the service was suitable to the occasion, the anthem sung being that of Boyce, "I have surely built Thee an house." The acoustical properties of the building have been decidedly improved by the enlargement of the chapel. To those who delight in an artistically and devotionally rendered choral service, Lincoln's Inn Chapel, with its excellent and select choir, its classical and accomplished organist, Dr. C. Steggall, presents much that will attract the earnest listener. The services are at 11 and 3 on Sundays.

An important sale is announced. The lease of the business premises, No. 60, Paternoster Row, the goodwill (including the book debts) of the music publishing and general music trade attaching to the well-known business as carried on during the last fifty years, under the style and title of B. Williams, the office and shop furniture and fittings, the extensive and valuable general trade stock, and the extensive and valuable stock of copyright and non-copyright plates, and the music appertaining thereto, etc., will be sold by auction by Mr. William Simpson (of the firm of Puttick and Simpson), with the consent and approbation of Mr. Justice Fry, the judge to whom this action is attached, pursuant to the judgment therein dated the 9th day of January, 1883, at the Gallery, 47, Leicester Square, on the 16th of April, 1883, and the seven following days, at twelve for one o'clock precisely on each day.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

The old proverb, "A prophet hath no honour in his own country," was, in the case of Berlioz, literally and painfully exemplified. While he lived—though he yearned for their sympathy—the French people treated him with utter contempt, and wounded his spirit with their bitter sarcasms. Berlioz went to his rest in 1869, and no sooner was the Franco-German war concluded in 1871, than they began to perceive that, as Germany could boast of a great and new musical genius in the person of Wagner, France could in Hector Berlioz pride herself on "the chief pillar of modern development." From that time to the present his music has been received in his native country with the greatest enthusiasm, and a monument is now about to be raised there to his memory. In his autobiography he writes, in strange contrast, alas! to the honours lavished upon him too late, "Behold me, if not at the close of my career, at least on the slope that more and more rapidly leads down to it; worn out; consumed, yet always consuming; and full of an energy that sometimes awakes with a violence that frightens myself. I begin to know French, to write passably a page of score, a page of verse or of prose; I can direct and animate an orchestra; I adore and respect art in all its forms. But I belong to a nation which, to-day, concerns not itself at all with noble manifestations of intelligence—a country having the Calf of Gold as its only god."

Having written on "Harold in Italy" for the Musical Standard some time ago, I need only now say that the performance was highly satisfactory, although the number of strings was not equal to that required by Berlioz.

Dvorák has now become a well-known name in our programmes, and his music is nowhere more enjoyed than at the Crystal Palace concerts. The selections from Handel and Mozart supplied the wants of those who are fond of variety, and to those who affect the more modern school they could not fail to be welcome. They were not unlike a few exquisite pieces of ancient statuary, placed in a newly furnished drawing-room.

Miss Mary Davies was charming in her three songs, and was twice recalled after Schubert's "Wohin."

MISS SASSE'S MATINEE.

Miss H. Sasse held a matinée on Wednesday, April 11th, at No. 30, Thistle Grove, South Kensington. She played with her sister Miss Grace Sasse, the Variations of M. Saint-Säens for two pianofortes, on a theme of Beethoven's (trio of scherzo from the Sonata in E flat, Op. 31), a piece by Chopin, Raff, and Mendelssohn. Miss Sasse is rather ambitious in her choice of texts, but she generally plays them with much taste, and if she perseveres in hard study, will no doubt make a name. Miss A. Roselli sang Gounod's "Noël," which effectively displays the dramatic quality of her voice, and Miss Eugenie Kemble's agreeable mezzo-soprano came out well in a song of Behrend. Mr. Poznanski rendered, with customary skill and savoir faire, his Romanza and Tarentelle, and joined Miss Sasse in Rubenstein's Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 13. Mr. W. Carter conducted.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY AT DRURY LANE.

A second hearing of Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," this week, tends to confirm the previous impression of your second contributor in the last issue, and suggests a few additional remarks. As regards the libretto, I agree with the critic of the Daily Telegraph that it is absurd to set commonplace dialogue to fine musical phrases; one is reminded of the awkward collision, at a certain York Festival, of the coda in a crashing Handelian chorus, with the words, uttered simultaneously by two agriculturalists who were talking over a recent dinner—"and apple pie." The line, "It is a lie, you know it is (a) lie," hardly sounds like classical blank verse, and many of the rhymes call for criticism; such as "stranger and anger," "luggage and baggage," and such like.

To refer to Mr. Mackenzie's music. Nothing can be more graphic and picturesque than the opening chorus of market women. The "Vocero" is very pretty and well scored. The first duet of the lovers (Act I.) makes quite a point of the opera; and when Colomba joins, the situation rises to a dramatic and musical climax. The finale of this Act is capitally "put up," but rather too protracted, and to leave Orso alone on the stage seems a mistake. In Act II., the opening scena of "Colomba," admirably rendered (on Monday) by Mdme. Valleria, claims attention; the Tarantella is the only part of the ballet music that has struck me on either occasion, the rest sounds commonplace stuff and not new. The quartet of men's voices in A flat is very excellent part writing, preceded by some fine florid scoring of the band, which, in the quartet, subdues its sounds with good effect. Towards the end of Act II. some capital writing is thrown away upon a sort of penny-a-line report of the murder that has provoked Colomba's vengeful wrath; and the end struck me again as weak, notwithstanding many elegant features of orchestral score.

The Prelude to Act III. is really beautiful, but the "British public," as a rule, vulgarly ignore instrumental music in the opera house, and only hush their silly talk when the artists lift up their voices! I was obliged to change my seat on Monday in order to avoid two prattlers behind, one with a pianoforte score in hand! The orchestral accompaniments of Orso's opening scene should be noticed. His love song in G, and Chilina's ballad in F sharp minor, are recognized as pearls of price, and its publishers already advertise them for separate sale. In the latter will be missed, so far as the salon is concerned, the weird undercurrent of the wood wind instruments, so deftly seconded by the strings, with drum obbligato. Why does Orso swoon after shooting the two assassins? I continue to think the "Requiem" chant feeble and ineffective; but Colomba sings with great effect, and here, at the cry of "Vendetta," on the accomplishment of the heroine's object, the opera ought to end.

The duet of Colomba and Chilina in Act IV. has a few passages slightly suggestive of Mozart's "Batti, batti"; here the clarionet is aptly and charmingly used. The action in the dark, throughout this last act, increases the tedium of the situation. The final duet of the lovers improves on acquaintance, but nothing can remove the impression of de trop; one feels impatient for light and the fall of the curtain.

To sum up, "Colomba," as noted by my friend of the Daily Telegraph, will not attain the age of an old oak, but the acorns are genuine, and will probably produce good fruit in other forms. Genius is manifest, and the principle on which the composer works a sound one—in my opinion at least. Mdme. Valleria will be indispensable at future representations. An apology was offered for Mr. H. Pope (the Count and Governor) on Monday night.

The Times, noticing the second performance of Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," eulogizes Mdme. Valleria's "creation" of the part as the most artistical of the modern lyrical stage. Mr. McGuckin's Orso, it is said (but herein the writer must differ in opinion), promises to be as perfect, from a histrionic point of view, as it was from the beginning, with regard to the vocal part of his task. Judicious excisions, notably of the ensemble at the end of Act II., have reduced the time of performance to about three hours; but it must be stated that, on Monday, the writer could not leave the theatre, without loss of material, before half-past eleven.

The remarks of the Times on the music of the opera quite coincide with the opinion here, and heretofore, expressed by the writer. "Music of this kind" (says the Times) appeals alike to the artist and the intelligent listener . . . We may, however, refer more especially to the excellency of the instrumentation—a feature in which, perhaps, more than in any other, Mr. Mackenzie has profited by the study of Wagner's music." (The preludes to Acts I. and III. are specially commended.) All through the work, moreover, the orchestra plays an important part. By its means the continuity of the musical design is frequently effected, although, on the other hand, vocal melody was by no means discarded. The voices and the instruments form one harmonious design, and it would be difficult to say which of the two is the more important component."

Mdme. Marie Roze's success in Gounod's "Faust," last week, was brilliant. She again appeared in "Fidelio" on Wednesday. Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" was repeated on Tuesday, when Mdlle. Baldi sustained the title part, vice Mdme. Georgina Burns. She suffered from nervousness in the first Act, and this affected both her elocution and intonation. In Act II. Mdlle. Baldi recovered herself, and achieved a decisive success later on. A bouquet was presented after Act III., and another at the end of the opera. Mr. Barton McGuckin, in splendid voice, excelled in the air, "And she is true." Mr. Ludwig again made his mark as Claude Frollo.

"Esmeralda" is a pretty and a very clever opera, but might be curtailed. Two young "exquisites," on Monday, were overheard in the lobby to express a preference of this work to "Colomba"! As wisely might one compare a full-blown rose with a tiger-lily! Both operas move on the modern Wagnerian lines with continuity and design, but the styles are essentially different, and "Colomba" is the greater production of the two. A. M.

THE MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

The trial of Saturday last, April 14th, was most satisfactory. Mr. A. Gilbert's Pianoforte Trio in A minor is an unpretentious and very agreeable work, conducted by the composer, with Mr. Ellis Roberts as violinist, and Mr. W. C. Hann, a young player of great promise, as bass string. Mr. W. C. Macfarren's Sonata for pianoforte and 'cello in E minor is a very good specimen of this able professor.

"More suo" is not a new work, but has been published some time. Miss Foskett and Mr. W. C. Hann were its interpreters. Mr. Tobias A. Matthay's "17 Variations for pianoforte, on an original theme" in C, betokens much cleverness, with a decided leaning to modern "notions." Dr. Gustave Wolff's "3 Novelletten" for piano and violin, played by Messrs. E. H. Thorne and Ellis Roberts, is like every other work which I have had the good fortune to hear from the pen of this clever musician, and display a musicianship of a high order, with originality. A theme in No. 3 of the Novelletten recalls an episode in E minor of Schumann's "Arabesque"; but such reminiscences are quite exceptional in the case of Dr. Wolff. Mr. G. Gear's vocal pieces, "A tiny floweret" and "The old journal," deserve notice: they were nicely rendered by Miss Norah Hayes. Mr. Emanuel Aguilar's "Duo Concertante" in C, for two pianofortes, played by the composer and Mr. C. E. Stephens, is a fine and praiseworthy piece of sterling music. The duo begins with a slow movement, with some most captivating melody, and, well contrasted in effects, is followed by an allegro moderato, full of grace and brightness. The work was most cordially received. On a recall to the platform, Mr. Stephens modestly left the composer to respond alone, but he, Mr. Aguilar, on finding himself "unaccompanied," pulled up his worthy coadjutor to share the honours, thus "equally divided," as regards the execution; for both pianists are du premier rang. Let me add that I had the opportunity to hear M. Aguilar's duo again (after his own Recital) on Monday afternoon, and liked it better than before. A. M.

Mr. Geaussent's choir performed Gounod's oratorio "The Redemption" at a recent concert. Opinions differ as to the merits of the performance, but not as to the earnestness of those engaged therein. It was thought that the orchestral and choral forces were not quite strong enough for the work to be done in some departments.

MR. BONAWITZ'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

At the second concert, on Wednesday, April 11, Mr. Bonawitz played, with immense power and all requisite impetuosity, the "Sonata Appassionata," also Schubert's Impromptu in B flat, Schumann's "Novellette," No. 8; Mendelssohn's "Scherzo a Capriccio" in F sharp minor, and his own effective arrangement of Luther's Hymn. Another acceptable composition of Mr. Bonawitz was the Valse in E flat from his opera "Osnolenka," arranged as a pianoforte duet, and played by himself with Miss Cecilie Brousil. Miss C. Brousil chose two violin solos of Mr. Bonawitz, a Nocturne and a Valse Caprice, and joined him in a fine rendering of Beethoven's duet Sonata in G (No. 3 of the "Emperor Alexander"). A very admirable contralto vocalist, Miss Lena Law, made a deep impression upon a select audience in an air from the "Nitocri" of Mercadante, and "Chi vive amante" from Handel's "Poro." Mr. Bonawitz, on request, transposed Handel's song a semitone, from F to E major.

Mr. Bonawitz's annual soirée will be held at the Bluthner Rooms, in Kensington Gardens Square, on May 9.

THE LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At a recent concert of the professional students of this Academy, so ably directed by Dr. Wylde, the following pupils distinguished themselves by proficiency as pianists, viz.:—Misses Ida and Ethel Fraser, Miss M. Osborne, Miss R. Griffiths, Miss Ruf, Miss E. Evans, Miss A. Stevens, Miss Hyman, and Miss Titmas. A daily contemporary particularly praises Miss Griffith for her brilliancy and firm execution. She played the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Concerto—no easy task. Other pianoforte texts chosen by the pupils, were Mendelssohn's "Rondo Brillant" in E flat; his Serenade in B minor, the first movement of Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for two pianofortes and band; Chopin's Valse in A flat; part of a concerto by Dr. J. Hiller, and the adagio and finale of Weber's Concerto in E flat. As violinists, who appeared, with honour, Miss K. Chaplin, Mr. Skuse, and Miss A. Dinelli, and Mr. G. Newman, Miss Dinelli, and Miss Chaplin, deserve special mention. The vocalists were Mr. Reakes, Mr. Ellison, Miss L. Lether Garrod, Miss R. Moss, Mr. O. Noyes Miss L. Carreras, Miss F. Smith, and Miss A. J. Smith, and Miss A. J. Martin, Miss Moss sang, "Va dit elle," from "Robert le Diable." The Academy appears to be flourishing, and the professors to be doing good work. Most of the violins in the band were held by young ladies.

MAIDENHEAD.

The Philharmonic Society brought their season to a close on Tuesday, the 3rd inst., with a concert in the Town Hall. The following formed the programme:—

Allegro Vivace, Sinfonie in C	Mozart.
"Song of Victory"	Hiller.
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber.
Song, "L'Oiseau"	David.
Concerto in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra	Mozart.
Part-song, "Drops of Rain"	Lemmens.
Entr'acte in B flat ("Rosamunde")	Schubert.
Chorus, "Forth to the meadows"	Schubert.

A glance at the above will be quite sufficient to show that an interesting selection had been made. Hiller's cantata of course attracted the most attention; it is undoubtedly a fine work, and improves very much on acquaintance. It is rather remarkable that it should have been so very little performed until quite recently, but the last season seems to have brought with it a sudden popularity. The work makes considerable demands on the chorus, the writing being in many cases both brilliant and very effective. "The heathen are fallen" is undoubtedly the finest number, though the final chorus contains some fine passages. The solo parts are not very important. The execution on the whole was very good; both soloist (Miss Jessie Royd) and chorus evidently found it very trying. The second part of the concert was chiefly remarkable for the excellent playing by the orchestra of the "Oberon" overture, and the charming "Entr'acte" from "Rosamunde," which is always enjoyable. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus.Bac., Oxon., was warmly applauded at the close of the piano concerto, and an encore was accorded to Lemmens' part-song, which was exceedingly well sung. The orchestra was led by Mr. J. S. Liddle, and Mr. J. G. Wrigley conducted.

MR. AGUILAR'S RECITALS.

At Mr. Aguilar's second recital, on Monday afternoon, he gave an admirable reading of Schubert's Sonata in B major, of four movements, by some styled the "Military" Sonata, on account of certain passages suggestive of drums and other martial instruments. These occur at the outset, also in the andante (E major), where the auditor is reminded of the cognate movement (same key), in Beethoven's Third Pianoforte Concerto. In the second theme of the first allegro occurs a charming phrase that suggests one in the finale of Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 31, No. 1. The scherzo in G is quaint, the rondo very graceful and fluent music. Mr. Aguilar afterwards played Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 81 ("L'Absence," &c.), with much taste and appreciation of the spirit of the text. His own compositions, on Monday, included the Nocturne in F sharp (major), "Rêve," and "Avere"; a Prelude and Fugue in E minor; the Transcription of "Weber's Last Valse" (not by Weber); the "Dream Dance" in A, and the Bolero in D minor. Liszt's Fifth Hungarian Rhapsody, in B flat minor and major, completed the list. Two pupils of Mr. Aguilar acquitted themselves much to the satisfaction of the audience. A very little girl, Miss Mary Troughton, played Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "Allegro Grazioso" in A, with remarkable correctness and tact; another, Miss Marion Crockenden, chose Chopin's Valse in A flat, and a Nocturne in G, both well executed.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

In my last letter I made brief mention of a new "Passion-music," by Mr. Gaul, the organist of St. Augustine's. The following are a few notes made on the occasion of its first production at the Church on Good Friday; but as the composer intends revising and orchestrating the score (the voice-parts on Good Friday having simply the organ accompaniment) criticism can only touch, at present, upon the general construction of the work. The text of the composition, varied and elaborate in its structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, who is author also of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct "scenes." The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively:—"The Traitor at the Table," "The Denial," "The Condemnation before Pilate," "The Mockery on Calvary," "The Shadow of Death," and "The Holy Sepulchre." Each comprises a prophetic portion preceded by a short chorale, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event; and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. As regards the composer's share in the work it must be noted that, whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allotting the different solo musical passages without regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Nevertheless, it may be feared that the distribution of the solo passages among several voices may tend to impair the unity of effect. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious solo, "Blessed are the departed," the writing approaches the ordinary aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. In those sections, notably that of the "Unjust Condemnation," where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguishes itself in comparison with that in the "Holy City" and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed me most favourably was the chorus, "The fining-pot is for silver," the beautiful choral passage "Watch and pray," the whole of the choral passages of the condemnation scene; the contralto air, "Oh, hear ye this, all ye people"; the fine chorus, "Consider this," the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass, "Thou hidest thy face, O Lord"; the quartet, "Hat God forgotten to be gracious"; the strikingly effectiv chorus, "God is not a man that he should lie"; the sol before mentioned, "Blessed are the departed," with i choral appendage (soli quartet); and last, but not least i merit, the refined setting of Adelaide Proctor's line "Why shouldst thou fear the beautiful angel Death?" M Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for Mr. Blissard lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were fro among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogethe considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatl enhance his already high reputation in the lines of sacre composition. The choir of St. Augustine's (augmente on this occasion) acquitted itself excellently under the di rection of Mr. Richard Payne. The principal soloist were Misses Surgey and Wheeler, and Messrs. Breen Horrex, and Campion. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the service. On Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening.

Miss Miller gave a very interesting concert in the new lecture theatre of the Midland Institute on the 29th ult. The violinist was Miss Skinner (a pupil of Joachim); the vocalist, Miss Edith Santley; and the 'cello, Mr. W. F. Roden. Miss Miller is a representant of the pure, classic order of "pianism." The characteristic beauty of Miss Miller's style resides essentially in her almost ideal precision, in the phrasing and in the technique generally. The solo pieces were such not calling for much marked individuality of the performer. Weber's sonata hardly admits of much variation in "reading"; and the lines of the three Schumann items are well worn enough by this time. Altogether considered, conception as well as exposition, I think Miss Miller was faultless. Miss Skinner is a highly-skilled executant, and her performance was a perfectly good one. For the commendable taste shown by Miss Santley in the selection of her songs, and the artistic manner in which they were delivered, too much praise cannot be given. Mr. Roden played with much neatness his little pieces. Schubert's Trio (for piano, violin, and 'cello), a fine specimen of his most matured style, received a perfectly worthy rendition.

An instrumental concert was given on the 12th inst., in the Masonic Hall, by Miss Emily Walker, supported by Miss Lucy Riley, violinist, and Mr. Rowland Winn. The programme was unexceptionable in respect to the artistic worth of the selections made. The pianoforte pieces were sufficiently contrasted to display fully the most varied qualities of the performer, ranging, as they did, from the classic extremes of Bach and Schumann to the virtuoso melody embroideries of Thalberg. The pianoforte works of Schumann mainly rely for their full comprehension upon a pre-understanding of the composer's poetical motive; but I can hardly account the pianist to have completely exhibited the full genius of the pieces, though her playing was, in all strictly musicianly respects, perfect and masterly. As regards Miss Walker's interpretation of Beethoven, much the same is to be said as I have just noted with respect to her rendition of Schumann's pieces. Her execution is polished, flawless, and her "reading" of the master thoroughly sound and classic; if any shortcoming there is, it lies in the want of a little more tenderness of treatment, especially in the more lyrical passages. In the second part of the concert Miss Walker's display of technique was quite irreproachable. In addition to pieces of Bach, Taubert, and Thalberg, an étude of Chopin was also given. The two songs from the collection of Mendelssohnian favourites were those in A flat and A minor (Nos. 19 and 21), well contrasted and well delivered. Of Miss Walker's lady-coadjutor, I am pleased to be enabled to speak in the best terms of encomium. She combines technical qualities of a superior order with earnestness, refinement, and warmth of expression. The charming well-known trifles of the partner-composers, Heller and Ernst (played by Miss Walker and Miss Riley), agreeably concluded the concert. It only remains to say of Mr. Winn that he performed his part with his customary delicacy and taste. The room, though not filled, showed a very good attendance.

Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, S.E.—It is pleasing to note that the Ballad Concerts at the above Hall still attract numerous audiences. That of Thursday was most successful, both as regards selection of music and performers. Miss Hepwell may be congratulated on having provided an entertainment much to the enjoyment of the visitors, and on having been most satisfactorily helped by Mesdames Lynn, Edith Phillips, Alice Cruttenden, Helen Warde, Messrs. Herwen Jones, and Quartermayne, while Messrs. Dinelli and Lindo presided effectively at the piano. It is to be hoped that these concerts which are given on Thursdays will become a regular institution in South London. On Friday April 20th, a number of distinguished members of the legal profession held a grand temperance demonstration.

Ealing.—The first concert of the Orchestral Society was given on Tuesday at the Lyric Hall, when an excellent programme was gone through in very creditable style. The orchestra numbered about 24, and amongst the pieces played were the overture to "Prometheus" (Beethoven), and "Esmeralda" (Hermann). A Symphony in E flat by Romberg, and two or three gavottes. Mendelssohn's G minor pianoforte concerto was also played, the solo being admirably rendered by Miss Lottie Harrison, a promising young member of the society. In the vocal music Miss Fuselle sang in a very able manner, an air by Rode's and "The Worker" (Gounod.) Miss Alice Davies was encored for "Fanchiulle il coro," and the Rev. F. G. Elstob sang Bennett's "May Dew," and "Sweet Flower." Mr. Harold E. Stidolph, for whose benefit the concert was announced, conducted carefully and efficiently.

Southend, Essex.—Mr. W. F. Bradshaw's grand Spring concert was held in the Public Hall of this marine resort on April 12. Mdlle. Ida Audain distinguished herself in harp solos, notably Thomas's arrangement of the "Harlech" march, and Oberthür's "La Cascade," which was rapturously encored. Mr. E. Grime, a promising bass vocalist, made his mark in the old air "Down among the dead men," and won a bis for W. H. Jude's song "Deep in the mine." Mr. W. Townsend, Miss Bulloch, Miss H. Hardy, Mdme. Inez Maleska, and Miss L. Robins sang in turn. A selection from "Iolanthe" was given. Miss Audain also played harp solos last week at the Highbury Athenæum, and Mr. E. Grime, whose profound voice reminds one of Signor Foli, sang the song of Polyphemus in G minor, "O, ruddier than the cherry" with éclat. Miss Ida Audain was twice encored at Highbury in her harp solos.

Banbury.—The Banbury new Philharmonic Society gave their last concert for the season on Tuesday evening, April 10th, in the Exchange Hall. The first part consisted of Stainer's sacred cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," and a miscellaneous selection completed the programme. Miss Ferrari (soprano), Mr. A. S. Fryer (tenor), and Mr. Grice (basso), had been engaged as soloists. Miss Ferrari is of local extraction, a fact that may in some measure account for her very cordial reception. She has a clear and powerful voice of good compass. Mr. Fryer was fairly successful, although his voice appeared to lack strength, while Mr. Grice, a great favourite here, was applauded to the echo for his songs in part 2. It is a pity that a full orchestral accompaniment was not secured for the cantata, the piano and organ (well played by Miss Lewis and Mr. Clough) being barely sufficient. The rendering of the choruses reflects great credit upon Mr. M. J. Monk, Mus.B., the society's excellent conductor.

Acton.—An excellent concert was given on Wednesday in the Central Hall of the new Board Schools at Acton, a really fine room capable of seating 700 people, which was used for the first time. The first part of the programme was devoted to Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," sung by a chorus of about 50 voices, the solos being taken by Master Townsend, Mr. Williams, and the Rev. C. M. Harvey. The accompaniments were rendered by Miss Slade on the pianoforte, and Mr. Harold E. Stidolph on the harmonium. The performance of the cantata was eminently satisfactory, and reflected credit on the conductor, Mr. E. H. Sugg. In the second part Miss Annie Lanatt was loudly encored for the rendering of "She wandered down the mountain side" and "Forget and forgive," a similar compliment being paid to Mr. Felix Sumner for his violin solo, and Master Townsend for his singing of "The Liquid Gem." Some part-songs and pieces by local amateurs made up a very agreeable programme, which was thoroughly enjoyed by a large audience.

Brixton Choral and Orchestral Society.—On April 9th, this Society gave a performance of Mr. Prout's new cantata "Alfred," a work which was criticised in this journal at the time of its production, under the composer's own direction at the Crystal Palace concerts some weeks ago. The present performance appeared to give considerable satisfaction to the large audience which filled the Gresham Hall, the choral numbers and the "Triumphal march" in particular, calling forth loud demonstrations of approval. Mr. Lemare may fairly be congratulated on the decided improvement in his band, which has evidently had some of its weaker constituents weeded out greatly to the general good: indeed were it not for that tendency towards incorrect intonation, that is, alas, so common amongst amateur orchestras, there would be but little fault to find. The chorus was not altogether satisfactory, appearing to be lacking in finish in piano passages, and showing hesitancy now and then in taking up leads. The chorus "Lift the Raven Standard" was, however, given with commendable crispness and vigour. The soloists, Miss Hilda Coward, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Bridson, sang their music in excellent style throughout, although Mr. Kenningham, in the trying music of the part of "Alfred," was obviously struggling against a severe cold. Miss Coward's clear fresh voice told well, and gives promise of a successful career for this young lady in the future. In the second part of the programme Gade's pleasing "Spring's Message" and Handel's organ concerto, No. 5, were performed, the solo instrument in the latter work being efficiently taken by Mr. W. E. Stark. Mr. W. Lemare conducted throughout the evening.

Faversham.—Mr. C. D. Hobday's third annual classical concert, which took place on April 11th, was highly successful from a musical point of view. The programme was rendered with befitting care and taste from beginning to end, and the lovers of piano, violin, and violoncello had the gratification of hearing those instruments to advantage in the solos of Miss Glyde, Mr. C. M. Gann, and Mr. J. Norman; while the first movements of Hummel's trio in E flat, and the allegro, Andante, and Minuet from Mozart's Quartet No. 14, in the same key (in the latter of which Master Hobday took the second violin and Mr. E. B. Norman the viola), afforded instances for the combination of strings. Miss Ambler and Mr. Thompson pleased the listeners by their expressive singing. The audience was highly appreciative, though not large—a fact to be regretted when it is considered how valuable a good exposition of chamber singing is, if only from an educational standpoint.

Cork.—A recital by the pupils of the Cork School of Music was held in the Assembly Rooms on the 10th inst. The programme was miscellaneous.—It is intended by the musical committee of the forthcoming exhibition to hold two concerts on the opening day, with Mr. J. Robinson of Dublin, as conductor; the chorus and orchestra to number 250 performers. Mr. T. J. Sullivan of this city has been appointed choirmaster, the committee have commissioned Mr. Magahy to build an organ for them.—A very fair amateur performance of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's "Sorcerer," and "Trial by Jury," was given on the 16th inst. by Mr. Robert Howard's operatic corps at the theatre. There will be three other performances. This is their third appearance in public, having on two former occasions given Sullivan's "Pinafore" and Reid's "For lack of gold" (MS.). The only fault was the imperfect intonation of the ladies' choruses. Mr. Howard conducted with his usual ability.

Bradford.—The Manningham Vocal Union gave a concert in the Bradford Church Institute on April 10th, when there was a very large attendance. Mr. James H. Rooks, the present conductor of the society, has proved no less zealous and enterprising than his predecessor, Mr. F. C. Atkinson; and the concert of Tuesday night will stand forth as perhaps the most important that the society has hitherto given. No effort seems to have been spared to make the concert a success, for not only was a new work of much significance—Hofman's "Cinderella"—selected for performance on this occasion, but valuable outside aid, in the shape of soloists and instrumentalists, had been secured. A small orchestra of two to a part for the strings, with the addition of four wind instruments, harmonium and pianoforte were engaged; and the services of Miss Emilie Norton, Madam Armitage, and Mr. Thornton Wood were secured as solo vocalists. A miscellaneous selection made up the second part of the performance.

Stratford.—The Stratford musical competitions were brought to a close on April 14th, when the town-hall was densely crowded, to hear the competition between choral societies for the chief prize. The judges were Mr. Ridley Prentice, Mr. J. F. H. Read, J.P., and Mr. W. G. McNaught. They awarded the prize to the Upton Choral Society (conductor Mr. Proudman). Choirs from Leyton and Plaistow received second and third prizes. On the previous day and on Saturday afternoon the competitions in junior and senior pianoforte performance and sight-playing, in solo singing for all voices, in sight-singing, in quartet singing, and in composition, had been proceeding under the same judges. There were altogether 150 entries, which comprised 350 candidates, all of them resident in the district. The preparation for this event has stimulated the musical talent of the district during the past winter. In giving their awards the judges bore testimony to the high level of attainment reached by the candidates. The originator and director of the competitions is Mr. J. S. Curwen, who describes them as an adaptation of the Welsh Eistedfodd. The proceedings ended amid great enthusiasm with the distribution of prizes.

Hull.—Miss Eva Farbstein gave a grand evening concert on April 13th, at the Jarratt Street Rooms, before a fashionable and highly appreciative audience. The talented concert-giver, who possesses a beautiful and well trained soprano voice, was first heard in Gilbert Byass's new song "For thee"; afterwards in grand scena "Ernani involami" (Verdi), and "Robin Adair," all of them splendidly sung and enthusiastically encored. The refined rendering of the Scotch ballad created quite a furore, and after being recalled, Miss Farbstein gave as a response, "Home sweet home." The other vocalists were: Madame Evans-Warwick, who sang charmingly "Only a child" (Muscat), and "The Ferry of Galloway" (Luard). Mr. Bernhard Lane's artistic singing of Blumenthal's "May Queen" elicited a well deserved encore. Mr. W. Thomas, of Bristol, sang his songs well, by Mattei and Molloy. Among the vocal items were the quartets "God is a Spirit" (Sterndale Bennett) and "Good night, beloved" (Pinsuti). Miss Hildegard Werner's performance of "The moonlight sonata" (Beethoven) and "Polka de concert" (Wallace), was highly appreciated by the evidently much pleased audience. Miss Rose Farbstein efficiently acted as accompanist. The concert concluded with a musical sketch "The Harvest Home," cleverly performed by Mr. M. B. Spurr.

"Horns," Kennington.—The Kennington Orchestral Club gave their second annual concert at the above rooms on the 17th inst. The programme was an excellent one, and it would be satisfactory if I could speak conscientiously in such eulogistic terms of the performance, when a purely amateur Orchestral Society chooses such works as the overture to "Nabucodonosor Verdi," Mozart's No. 9 Symphony in D, and that lovely Romanze (No. 2), for violin and orchestra. It certainly should be somewhat above the ordinary run of such societies. The Kennington Club is ambitious; there are many easier and effective pieces written which Mr. Orbel-Hinchcliff, the conductor, might with advantage put in rehearsal. In Mozart's Symphony the wind instruments were seriously out of tune at times. In Beethoven's Romanze (No. 2), the violin solo was taken by Herr Schöwheyde, who also acted as leader. In his solo he exhibited a large amount of technique, but too little "feeling." The vocalists were Miss Edith Luke, Miss Levina Ferrari, and Mr. Alfred Kenningham, the last-named gentleman worthily taking the honours of the evening. The arrangements were most satisfactorily carried out by Mr. Howard Davis, the Secretary, and Mr. Buxton, the worthy proprietor.

Great Yarmouth.—The Great Yarmouth Musical Society are to be congratulated on the result of the concert they gave on April 12th in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall. The oratorio chosen was Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," a composition that they had on two previous occasions performed, and with which they were pretty familiar. The principal vocalists were Miss A. Parry, Miss H. D'Alton, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. Hilton. Mr. Stonex, the respected and able teacher of the class, conducted. Mr. Lane presided with much ability at the harmonium, and Mr. Cooke was, as usual, leader of the band, which was composed of local musicians—several from Norwich and London. Miss Parry did her best in the difficult music she had to sing. The air "O Liberty!" with the violoncello accompaniment, was one of the principal features of the part; as were also the airs "So shall the lute and harp awake," "From mighty kings," and "Wise men flattering." Mr. Dalzell took pains to render his part as effective as possible, and his execution of the air "Sound an alarm" was praiseworthy. Miss D'Alton and Mr. Hilton sang in a faultless style. There is very little for the contralto to do in "Judas Maccabæus," but what little Miss D'Alton had to do she did well. Mr. Hilton was in splendid voice on Thursday night. An enthusiastic encore followed his singing of "The Lord worketh wonders," his rendering "Arm, arm, ye brave" and "Rejoice, O Judah," equally effective. Mr. Stonex conducted with care and skill, and the choruses were wel rendered.

Guildford.—The performances held in the Western Hall on April 11 and 12, under the auspices of the Guildford Choral Society, were, in a musical sense, as successful as any that have ever taken place in Guildford. Mr. Prout's fine cantata, "Alfred," which was produced with a power and finish both in its solo, choral, and orchestral portions that would have done credit to the metropolis itself. The cantata will take high rank as a leading English musical composition, and does the highest credit to Mr. Prout's originality and ability. The solo parts were splendidly taken by Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Alfred Kenningham (tenor), and Mr. H. H. Brereton (bass). The sentinel's part was well sung by Mr. Edwin (Guildford Choral Society). The interest was retained from beginning to end, and the composer and conductor, Mr. Prout, in response to the plaudits, had to bow his acknowledgments. Mendelssohn's beautiful "Hymn of Praise" was first performed, and this, thanks to the efforts of the conductor, Mr. Tiltman, is not new to the Guildford public, but it certainly was never produced in Guildford before with such a thorough completeness and effect as on Wednesday. From first to last, in all its parts, it was thoroughly successful, and the playing of the symphony was marked with precision and care. The difficult chorus "The night is departing" was rendered in such a manner by the choir as to meet with hearty expressions of approval. It is needless to say other than that the tenor singing of Mr. Alfred Kenningham was excellent, whilst in the duet singing Miss Annie Marriott and Miss Sophie Smith gave effect to the chorus, "I waited for the Lord." During the interval on April 11th, Mr. Prout attended in one of the rooms, and, addressing the members of the choir and band, said he wished to offer them his warmest thanks for the way in which they were kind enough to sing his music that afternoon. He was very pleased with it, and would not have thought could have been done so well in the provinces. He had also thank his friend, Mr. Tiltman, for getting together such an e cellent band, as it was a credit to him, and he thanked the gentlemen who composed the orchestra for the way they h performed their share of the work. On the evening of Ap 12th the soloists included Mrs. Jeffries, Miss Sophie Smith, M A. Kenningham, and Mr. Brereton. Without going into detai we may mention that the encores included Miss Sophie Smith "Es blinkt der Than" and "Absent yet present," Mr. Brer ton's "To Anthea," and Mr. Kenningham's "Salve dimora ("Faust"), which were all rendered with great effect. M Jeffries, who is deservedly popular as an amateur lady vocalis Guildford, sang Diehl's "Going to market," with skill. Th overtures to parts 1 and 2 "Masaniello" and "L'Italiani showed the evidences of careful study by Mr. Woods' instr mental class, and were deservedly appreciated.

Dublin University Choral Society.—There is real very little to be said by the press-man, whose business it is to the rôle of critic on the provincial press. Most, indeed I ma say all, musical and dramatic works of any importance are pro duced in London, or at some of the great English musical fes vals, before being presented to the inhabitants of the minor a less favoured portions of the United Kingdom. As the reviews and verdicts pronounced in the leading papers are almost in variably read and digested by musical amateurs in every corne of the Kingdom, these latter are, as a rule, in the awkward po tion of one who has heard the plot before he read the novel saw the drama, or what is worse, knows the melodies before he becomes sufficiently well acquainted with the libretto. Th lengthy explanation may be taken as indicating certain disad vantages under which the large audience heard Niels Gade's "Psyche" performed on Saturday last by the Dublin University Choral Society. Sir Robert Stewart, however, spared no effor to reproduce the work, performed at the recent Birmingham festival, in an efficient manner, and with as much completeness as his more or less limited resources could admit. The bar was composed of the best instrumentalists that could be pro cured in the city, but there must always be a disadvantage i listening to any orchestral performance where there is not the complete loss or suppression of individuality that springs from constant discipline and intimate knowledge of leaders and con ductors. This defect was noticeable at intervals during the performance on Saturday last. The choir, on the other hand sang remarkably well, with decision as well as precision. Whil it was very evident that the members were thoroughly acquainted with their work, I should not like to speak decidedly as to the opinions held by the audience regarding the work itself. For the work did not at any period awaken anything like enthusiasm and the general effect appeared to be rather disappointing than otherwise. Certainly Gade's cantata will scarcely become as popular here as his chamber music. The vocalists were fairly successful, and Sir Robert Stewart deserves the highest praise for his never-wearying efforts in keeping Irishmen well informed on the musical doings of the European Continent.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Liszt has returned to Weimar in excellent health.

Rubinstein's "Dämon" was performed for the first time in Leipzig on the 13th inst.

Mozart's operas are being given in Vienna in chronological order.

A new symphony by Louis Siebert was lately played in Wiesbaden with a fair amount of success.

A new comic opera by Ignaz Brüll, called "Königin Mariette," is to be produced in Munchen early in June.

Peter Benoit's oratorio "Lucifer" will be heard in Paris on May 7th.

Berlioz's "Requiem" was performed at the fourth concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna. The work found more admirers than upon previous occasions of its performance.

The annual gathering of German musicians will this year take place at Leipzig early in May. According to custom, the musical festival will last four days, and an oratorio by Bach will be given in the Church of St. Thomas.

The death is announced at Paris of M. Henri Ketten in his thirty-fifth year. M. Ketten, who will be remembered as a clever pianist and composer, received his training at the Paris Conservatoire, and gained some renown by his playing in London, New York, St. Petersburg, Melbourne, Vienna, and other large cities.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPOSER.

V.

PERHAPS no difficulty faces the upward progress of the productive artist, whatever may be the medium of his thought presentation, as the public want of faith in new work. "He asked for bread and "they gave him a stone," are words expressing in a single epigrammatic sentence the history of most men of genius; and the exceptions to the sad rule are for the most part merely the cases of men born to exceptional social advantages, whose friendly aids to fame have enabled them to scale the heights of reputation more quickly by favourably prompting public faith and judgment in their behalf. This want of faith is displayed in all directions. Even a simple witticism palpable enough to all minds, gains zest if attributed to DEAN SWIFT or to SYDNEY SMITH; a fact probably accounting for many an erroneously assigned bon mot. So in music the simplest and most natural 8 or 16 measure melody gives much more enjoyment when the name of some classical or popular composer is placed at the right hand side of its title. This preparedness of the public mind to delight only in what has been already admired, and its accompanying tendency to take no pains to discover what should be admired, is at once the great stumbling-block of the untried composer and the stronghold of the established tone-producer. But further however gifted composers have been and are being ruined as artists, by premature public acceptation brought about usually through the influence and industry of enthusiastic and interested friends in the position to bring social power to the composer's aid. For such premature publicity, as inclining the art-producer to relax his powers of self-examination and self-culture from the knowledge that whatever he may offer to the public, praise and a meed of popularity must follow, is a danger to the artist only second to the more trying peril of a too prolonged neglect; nay as regards the future, prolonged neglect is better far than premature popularity. Not the least treacherous feature of the last-named danger, is its tendency to induce the composer too anxious to get on in the world, to persist in the composition of too many works of the same kind and built upon the same and perhaps for the time being only, popularly accepted model, which may not be an enduring form capable of large art development. Such an error of judgment in the end dwarfs the composer's mental powers and inclination for real art-work, just as the female victim of some perverse and injurious fashionable article of attire is physically punished for the foolish pains she takes in order to be admired. Further, the public mind grows more critical and less grateful with the repeated presentments of a given type of work, in which novelty was likely enough one of the original sources of charm, just in proportion as the composer grows more easily satisfied with his readily repeated labours, and self-deceived, is falling unwarily into the "bed of roses" which will prove, unless he extricates himself in time, an artistic stagnation and perhaps his future downfall. The great composer is, indeed, not only a great artist, but essentially a great man, superior alike to the dangers of adversity and prosperity.

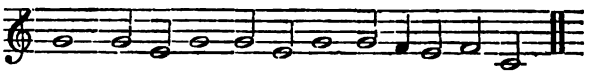
FORM IN VOCAL MUSIC.

II.

There is no doubt that vocal music was in the earlier stages of its development simply a musical expression of the operations of speech. It has been my task more than once to show the affinity. between the melodic formations of music gravitating on scale centres, and the inflections of the speaker's voice, rising above or falling below the ordinary level of his speaking voice. The early musical employments of the voice as still to be noted in the plain song intonations with their medium and grave inflections, were little more than the musical embodiment of the punctuation and expressive inflections of speech. There is a beautiful instance of this dual speech-melody in an ancient monastic form of repeating the confession in which the intonations are at once appropriate and touching. The commas were marked by the fall of a minor third, whilst an expressive turn and a deeper fall to the final note distinguished the more emphatic closes of the complete sentences at each full stop. I give one sentence in illustration of the simplicity and expressive beauty of this early vocal form in which verbal and musical expression and punctuation move together with such truthfulness and eloquence, selecting a favourable sentence for the purpose from the middle of the confession.



Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa.

Sung in unison by a body of earnest voices amidst the solemn surroundings of a great church, nothing can exceed the simple eloquence of such early vocal forms. One can only wonder that the fine expressive figures of this speech-melody and others of the same build are not employed in these days of the revival of church art. The earlier chant forms which are still represented by the so-called Gregorian chants to the Psalms, are musically an advance upon the still more primitive half spoken tune figures, which first built up song out of speech, as a higher eloquence built upon eloquence itself.

M. GOUNOD ON "CRITICISM."

The distinguished French composer's words on this topic are forcible, but not without a one-sided ring in them. With regard to himself it must be remembered that no composer has been better helped to a high position in his own life-time by the discerning critics. We in England, for instance, know full well that M. Gounod's reputation here was largely contributed to by the persistent and discriminating utterances of the late Henry Chorley in his favour in the columns of the Athenæum and elsewhere; not to mention the names of other large-sighted writers who at once recognised M. Gounod's merits. The truth is M. Gounod has been simply declaiming against bad criticism, and unconsciously proclaiming the value of patient, thoughtful, and carefully pronounced judgments. The inconsistency of M. Gounod's position in this matter is aggravated by a presumed desire on his part for literary fame which he would doubtless have purchased to some extent by writing on musical topics, and by the fact that he has himself within the last few weeks undertaken the delicate duties of a musical critic. However, everyone is glad to hear the opinions of such a large-minded and sympathetic artist as M. Gounod is everywhere acknowledged to be. With regard to the cases of Beethoven and Wagner, it may surely be allowed that the geniuses must lead the critics before the critics can lead the public. It is clear that the stumbling-block to the critical mind has ever been either the neglect of, the departure from, or the enlargement of, the ethics of the art; and the attitude of cautious acceptation is on the whole, as M. Gounod himself practically confesses, a desirable position for the critic to assume. However, it is to the enlightened critics the world is chiefly indebted for the after all comparatively prompt recognition of some of the world's most original minds. To turn back to the cases of Beethoven and Wagner, who in the first instance save the critics besought people to listen to their works and who guided the public mind to a larger acceptation of their methods of thought and taught us in the end to admire their most remarkable efforts? There is, nevertheless, a moral in M. Gounod's words; it seems to be this, trust not too much to any impressions built upon critical examination, for no intermediary mind can entirely assess the value to the listener of thoughts intended by the composer to appeal directly to the hearer himself. All the same, the critical function is one of undoubted utility, as leading the public mind by means of experienced, watchful, systematised judgment, to a quicker estimation of art-work than would be attained to without guidance, and as helping to erect art-principles and standards, and so re-acting with advantage to the progress of art upon the minds, habits of thought, and methods of cultivation of the art-producers themselves. Critics, in short, rank among those useful types of the machinery of life which exist to the reduction of labour either mental or physical. The theologian may not be indispensable to those gifted with the spirit of religious faith, but he assists in the enlargement of religious sympathies and knowledge. The critic is to art what the theologian is to religion. Again, as it is deemed necessary to have doctors and lawyers to consult with, so it is well to have critics to guide us in matters which call for the exercise of the understanding at the same time as they appeal to the feelings. Of course there is much bad, interested and ignorant criticism, just as there is much good, disinterested, and learned art-examination in our midst. To say this, is merely to advance the self-evident proposition that critics, like composers, are but weak, mortal men, despite their gifts and acquirements. There is a tendency on the part of art-producers now and then to peevishly and impatiently attack the critics, in whom they are wrongly apt to see impediments to popularity; in such cases the artists are forgetting that to critical labour they are indebted for much of the publicity they already enjoy. The power of the critics in the work of enlarging public faith (always timid through prevailing ignorance) in art matters, is alone benefit enough to the world to justify their presence and to claim for them the respect of thinking artists and thoughtful listeners.

Digitized by Google

E. H. Turpin.

M. Gounod's words are here quoted :—

Montesquieu said : "The more wise men there are together the less wisdom there is." This means the more particular, exclusive, personal points of view on any question, the more chances there are for discussion, and disturbance of that unity which is Truth. Suppose, for a moment, one critic were called upon to select the paintings for a museum. How many original works would he not reject? The collections that we call museums are nothing else but monuments of that universal judgment which protects master-pieces against personal antipathy, and preserves them for the veneration and instruction of mankind. One advantage painting has over music is that it can express itself by works which appeal directly to the public without those intermediaries which music requires. This is one of the considerations which teaches how delicate a task is that of criticism, and how much the interpretation may mislead us as to the value of a work. While a picture is a permanent work, before which the spectator can pause at leisure, and which presents itself at one stroke in its entirety, the musical work is fugitive and only reveals itself to the intelligence and sensibility of the auditor in a succession of effects which robs most of the details of the value given them by the whole. If one thinks of the part played by memory in the success of a musical work, one must allow that it is very difficult to pronounce on the first hearing of a work in which so many different elements call for attention. How is musical criticism, usually, managed? Who of us who know what it costs to learn, and how much more it costs to conceal the little we know? Who of us, on the morrow of some great work, demanding study of all kinds, of a work where its author has spent perhaps years of his heart and brain—years, not merely of days, but of days and nights—who of us, I ask, would assume the responsibility of an immediate judgment of a work of such compass? But the critic takes his seat in the stalls, and next morning declares to the readers of his journal that this opera, of which he does not know a note, and which he has heard the evening before for the first time in his life, is a masterpiece or a blunder. What does he know of it? I ask. We men in the business, who wish to understand and who know how to listen, would not express an opinion, much less a judgment, on a work of which we have received only a rapid, fugitive impression. For my part, if fortune had placed me in the delicate situation of having to criticise a dramatic work, I would say to the editor: "Sir, you impose on me a great task. To be honest, I must neither be flippant nor hasty. I must have some days of reflection after the tumult of first impressions, which are necessarily vague. I must have time to disentangle this multitude of airs, duos, choruses and finales. I must put some order into this chaos of situations, characters, and instrumental colours. I do not want to have anything to withdraw or retract. My review must not appear till I can honestly say what I know.

Is criticism useful? I was going to say, Is it good for anything? I doubt it. Criticism is a profession : is it a mission? As for me, I see in it little more than amusement—so much talk. When a man has combatted Eugene Delacroix in the name of Ingres, or Ingres in the name of Delacroix, what will he have proved or produced? Nothing but what is perfectly useless. It might be useful to bring out the qualities of a man or a work. The progress—the movement that produces great men—this growth which creates giants—does not consist in acquiring the gifts which nature has not bestowed on us, but in developing the germs she has given us, and which are the form of our personality.

The artist is nothing but a given manner of thinking, clothed in a certain manner of expressing. Genius is the expression of a certain proportion between two elements; the element ideal, impersonal which assigns to works their level and their duration; and the real element which is relative and personal and the reason of their novelty. In other terms, genius is "a new manner of saying things that are not new." Nove non nova. Do you fancy one can become anything else than what one is? How could the? Progress implies identity. Place on a table a box, on the box a book, on the book a hat, and so on; you have not a growth, but a heap. Some minds are heaps; throw what you like into them, nothing germinaets, nothing consequently grows. There is not in all nature, in any forest, on any tree, on any branch two leaves alike; and you would place the whole human race in uniform and pass it in review! Art is feeling become science; it is the confused spontaneous element rendering itself precise by intelligence. It is necessary, then, to know much in order to judge, for it is necessary to be able to make the abstraction of one's personal sentiment, which is a prejudice; and it is necessary, at the same time, to be capable of measuring the amount of knowledge contained in a book. If you confine yourself to saying that such or such a thing pleases or displeases you, you teach me nothing; you express not a judgment, but a sensation, and do not prove that yours is better than mine.

On the other hand, it is useless to pile up argument on argument; invoke your grammarians to prove to me the merits of a work from which life is absent, or to establish that it does not conform to any of the known and recognised rules. I can reply, in the first place, these rules are not all the rules; for the presentiment of higher laws devised by the intuition of genius does not imply the violation of the other law which you invoke. When the great works of Beethoven made their first appearance in France, critics and musicians declared he was a barbarian who did not know how to write, and it required all the tenacity of Habeneck to collect and keep around that barbarian, who was soon to be a standard, the musicians which became the cradle of the famous society of concerts at the Conservatory Girard. The conscientious and intelligent chef d'orchestre, who was the successor of Habeneck, told me that after the first trials of the symphonies of Beethoven by the orchestra of the Odeon, the musicians flung from their desks the scores of the Pastoral Symphony, and cried that it was not music. Thanks to the perseverance of Habeneck, the education of musicians, of the public, of the critics, gradually was developed, and the eight first symphonies were recognised as masterpieces. But the ninth! A celebrated musician said to me : "It is the work of a delirious brain." Then some merit was allowed to the three first movements; but the last one, it was impossible, ridiculous, cacophonous. Some years later it was the turn of the last quatuors. They were madness—where was melody? No melody—that was the word, no melody. Well, tell me what melody is! You do not know, nor I, nor anybody, you will reply. It can not be explained; it can only be felt. It seems to me that it is no more felt than explained; for men denied melody to Beethoven yesterday, and grant it to him to-day. Men have denied melody to Rossini's "Barber," after that of Paesiello. After that, one can expect anything.

"COLOMBA."

The production last week at Drury Lane of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's opera "Colomba," has created a veritable stir, and the precise value of this lyrical drama—as its adapter terms it—is a question eagerly discussed in English musical circles. Now that the work has been heard a second and a third time, and its score and words have become more clearly understood, we stand in a better position to assess the merit of the opera, than was the case immediately after its first performance.

This duty of critical examination is indeed thrown upon us by the invitation which Herr F. Hüffer, the writer of the words, practically gives in the preface at the commencement of the book. In order that the value of his share in the work should be properly appreciated, a month ago, the words of the opera were printed, and issued to those persons to whom the task of public criticism is usually committed. Whether this unusual course was inspired by a consideration for the digestive faculties of the critics, or on more purely personal grounds, is of little concern to the general public. Neither is it necessary to notice in detail the controversy (which has now found its way into the columns of the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News), as to whether it is right for Herr Hüffer to write a work of this character; the ground taken being, that as musical critic of the Times, he must either judge his own production, or else vacate the critical chair in favour of a friend for the occasion: and further, that when a professed critic associates himself with a composer in the joint production of an opera, it would be well-nigh impossible for him on a future occasion, in which he was not associated with this particular composer, to criticise adversely his works, if justice necessitated such a course. It may, however, be observed en passant, that though the contention has a certain force, if it were to prevail, a critic, whatever ability he might possess, would be prevented from being a producer. The sarcastic doctrine, that critics are those who themselves have failed, is as untrue in music as it is in other arts. To mention one name only, Schumann has shown that the two offices are compatible and may be concurrent, and the biography of prominent members of all the recognised arts show us that they have frequently exercised their critical faculty for the public benefit. There is yet one more matter to which attention may be drawn. In the last issue of Messrs. Novello's new venture, The Musical Review, of which it is understood that Herr Hüffer is editor, appears an amateurish article pitched in a shrieking key, abusing those who have unfavourably criticised the libretto of "Colomba." The charge of envy he has brought against some of them is sublime in its absurdity. Criticism has no doubt been severe all round the newspapers; some of the writers have pierced the librettist with a keen rapier, and more than one has knocked him down with a heavy cudgel. It need only be remarked that these gentlemen are perfectly able to take care of themselves. The public will rather form its own judgment over the matter, in preference to merely endorsing the opinion found in an interested journal. Conclusions will also be drawn from the fact that the reprints of the press notices about the work in The Musical Review, are extensively garbled, and much important matter is eliminated. However, this aspect of the question may be speedily dismissed. Recrimination settles nothing; it is fairest to Dr. Hüffer to judge his work on its merits, and personalities should be avoided as much as possible.

The Preface to "Colomba" runs as follows :—

> In presenting the "lyrical drama" "Colomba," apart from its musical accompaniment, to the general reader of poetry, the author pleads guilty to "a purpose." What that "purpose" is this brief prefatory note is intended to explain. In a literature more developed and more varied than that of any other nation, the art of writing words for music has been strangely neglected. In the age of Tennyson, Browning, and Rossetti, the lyrical drama retains the Della Cruscan mannerism of diction of the "wits" of Pope's time, as reflected in the lofty minds of "the poet" Bunn, and the late Mr. Fitzball. So absolutely identified is that diction with the parlance of the typical librettist, that at last the public itself must have come to the conclusion of its necessity for the purposes of music. To dispel such an idea, prejudicial alike to both arts, the present libretto has been written. It is here attempted to show that the language fitted to musical purposes is not essentially different from that of general common sense and literary taste, that in a libretto it is not necessary for a person or number of persons to ejaculate, "Now good red wine we will be drinking," where every rational being in verse or prose would sing or say, "Now let me have some good red wine." That turn of phraseology is generally supposed to be necessitated by the scarcity in our language of the feminine or double rhymes and verse-endings so desirable for the rounding off of a musical sentence. That this is a mere prejudice it would be easy to show from the works of our great poets, beginning with Shakespeare. It may suffice, by way of a modest but obvious example, to refer the reader to the Corsican love-song at page 22, and the duet at page 30 of the present work, both of which consist for the greater part of double and even triple rhymes without a single instance of the objectionable present participle.

After some remarks admitting that poetry for music requires a greater freedom and variety than the spoken drama, he continues :—

> My intention was to emphasize a difference of system, not to claim exceptional excellence for my individual effort, and with the same intention this little work is submitted to the judgment of the benevolent reader.

It may be mentioned that Herr Hüffer's kind interest in our insular deficiencies is not confined to the improvement of English libretto writing. He has also posed as a reformer of our song music. A set of "Seven Songs, set to music by Franz Hüffer" (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.), reveals him in this benevolent rôle. Our author evidently has a penchant for preface writing; for prefixed to this singular collection is a Preface, in which, after severely condemning "the Metropolitan Market muse," he laments, that, "the treasures of English lyrical poetry have scarcely ever found congenial interpreters in the sphere of music, for which they seem so eminently adapted." He then offers his "poetical," "sentimental," "emotional," and "sweet quaint" compositions (as he indirectly designates them), as affording fitting examples of what such music should be. However, these songs are not now under review; but if the readers of the Musical Standard want some amusement, let them procure the set. It will be seen that Herr Hüffer did wise to disclaim any "reverential awe for the sacredness of form," the songs presenting an arrangement of notes fearful to contemplate, distressing to hear, and displaying some of the loftiest disregards of grammar trammels to be found in the whole range of printed music.

In the introduction to "Colomba," Herr Hüffer has supplied us with materials for much reflection. His Preface takes very distinct ground, and his remarks naturally fall into three divisions. First, he contemptuously derides our native librettists; secondly, he dogmatically lays down the canons which he assumes ought to govern this species of literary work; and thirdly, with that innate modesty which is regarded as a national characteristic of Teutons of a certain stamp, he calls attention to the naturalness and admirability of his own musico-dramatic treatment. Now let us briefly examine these various pretensions.

In the first place, it will be only just to Dr. Hüffer to remind the readers of the Musical Standard that he is a foreigner not long settled amongst us, and that therefore he cannot be expected to have a complete command over our modes of thinking, or of our English diction. Nor would it be fair to suppose that he has an intimate acquaintance with our rich poetical and dramatic literature. Were it otherwise, no comments would be too strong to make on his sweeping condemnation of our librettos, and his statement that the lyrical drama of the day retains the speech and imagery of Bunn and Fitzball. He has evidently erred through ignorance, and not prejudice, or he would not have classed the works of these writers with the librettos of Cumming's "Fairy Ring," Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," Randegger's "Fridolin," Dr. Bridge's "Boadicea," Cowen's "St. Ursula," Sir Julius Benedict's "Graziella," or the masterly nervous English productions of Prout's "Alfred," and Mackenzie's "Jason" both from the pen of Mr. Grist. However, respecting some of these matters touched on in Herr Hüffer's preface, and his own superior specimen verses, more anon.

We have first to consider the construction of the opera of "Colomba" from a dramatic point of view. As the Argument has already been given in the issue of last week, and is now pretty well known, it is unnecessary to go over the ground again. Prosper Mérimée's novel, from which the idea of the drama is taken, is a truly charming conception. It is as picturesque, as is the same author's popular "Carmen"; the various characters are drawn with the hand of a master, and present carefully finished pictures of Corsican life. But Herr Hüffer has well nigh destroyed the edifice of romance which the brilliant French author has so skilfully built up. He has so mutilated and altered the characters, that, with the sole exception of Colomba, the spectator can feel but a languid interest in any of their doings, as compared with the fascination experienced on reading the novel itself. Moreover, Mérimée is a keen psychologist, and that quality is entirely wanting in Herr Hüffer. The French writer, with delicate skill and truth, depicts the heroine as an ordinary maiden, graced with feminine attributes, of a practical turn of mind, and vengeful towards the murderers of her father simply on account of the traditional vendetta of her country. This painful duty satisfied, she returns to the usual avocations of life, and settles down into average respectability. Not so the German adapter's treatment of the subject. He has displayed but one side of Colomba's nature. Omitting entirely her pleasant qualities, and failing to appreciate the valuable touches of contrast that the original author has artistically furnished, he has supplied the girl with a rôle than which surely nothing more repulsive has been seen on the stage! To the exclusion of every other sentiment, she is possessed with an idée fixe, viz., fiendish craving for blood. It is impossible to feel any sympathy with a heroine of this offensive type, and perhaps Herr Hüffer was wise to adopt the stock device of weak authors, and cause her to be cleared out of the way by a chance shot. The stage is thus rid of so objectionable a young lady, and the Deus ex machina involved in the poetic justice meted out, would have delighted our transpontine theatre-goers, despite the sacrifice of dramatic fidelity over the transaction.

Another mistake of the adapter is seen in the weakness of the love feature. He has entirely altered the character of Lydia, the high-minded daughter of the English Colonel, turning her into a feeble conventional figure of a mild schoolgirl type. An opera ought certainly to contain some important love business, and the more impassioned it is the better; but in the case under examination, one can feel but little interest over the love affairs of Orso and Lydia. Indeed, the lady does not appear at all in the 2nd and 3rd Acts, and we almost forget her existence until she nervously ventures into the Robbers' Camp, and, like another Moses's daughter—as has been wittily said—discovers her lover lying hidden in the bulrushes. The whole matter is managed much more delicately in the novel, Lydia being deceived by Colomba, and brought unknowingly to meet Orso. Again, the evidence on which the Barracini are condemned is too flimsy to satisfy the scant exigences of even a drum-head court martial; while the acknowledgment made by one of the brothers of the supposed crime, is an avowal wholly gratuitous, dictated neither by necessity nor advanced proof. The finishing off of the Barracini betrays a want of stage experience; indeed it almost provokes laughter by its clumsiness, and the modern Irish landlord shooting mode in which the matter is managed, one brother after another dropping to Orso's gun. Corsicans who take pot-shots at their adversaries behind stone walls, and then occasionally pop up, like a Jack-in-the-box, to see how the victim is getting on, might take a valuable lesson in prudence and immediate flight from some of the patriotic brethren of our sister isle. The way in which the stage, representing a road some distance from the village, suddenly becomes filled with the various characters of the play, together with peripatetic monks conveniently provided with biers for the dead bodies, is slightly incongruous with the supposed loneliness of the spot, and affords a startling instance of the rapid spread of bad news. The opera might have ended here, or at any rate, the next Act need have only lasted long enough to get Orso pardoned, and the lovers properly united, according to the design of the original author. But this arrangement did not meet with the approval of the adapter; so in his desire to get rid of the bloodthirsty heroine, he causes her to be shot by accident, gloating in dying over the revenge achieved, and usurping priestly functions so far, as solemnly to join the hands of the lovers. The red glow which blazes up from the foot-lights at the moment, is certainly characteristic of the dying girl's passionate desire for revenge, and her constant whining over "our blood-stained honour"; while the concluding sentiment uttered by the Count "A great and noble heart has passed away," is thoroughly false, hollow, and sophistical.

At the beginning of this act the great mistake is made of repeating, coram populo, that which the audience already know respecting the shooting of the Barracini. This long-winded account of an event belonging to ancient history is altogether unnecessary; it not only produces ennui and weariness, but exemplifies a serious want of art-construction on the part of the librettist. It was a novel sight on the stage, and indeed touching, to see the wounded tenor condemned to go through his concluding part with an arm in a sling. One could not but feel sympathy with him, and further, regret that he was arranged to sing in an atmosphere of gunpowder smoke.

The stilted and unnatural style of Bunn and Fitzball is not to be commended; but they wrote many admirable lyrics, and their dramatic instinct guarded them against falling into mistakes similar to those which the author of "Colomba" has committed in his libretto.

The diction of "Colomba" next claims our examination. In terming his opera a "lyrical drama," Herr Hüffer evidently imagines that he has created something novel in design. But this is a mistake; his work is not original as to form. Long before he set foot on these shores, we possessed what are more correctly termed "Grand Romantic Operas," by Barnett, Balfe, Wallace, Benedict, and others; their construction was precisely similar to that of "Colomba," viz., a mixture of prose, blank verse, and lyrics. In the remarkable Preface to the work, reprinted above, we read that, "the author pleads guilty to 'a purpose.'" This singular guiltiness takes the form of asserting that in England the art of writing words for music has been strangely neglected; that the lyrical drama has the Della Cruscan mannerism of diction; that the language of a libretto should be the language of general common-sense and literary taste, and that irrational phraseology is supposed to be necessitated by the scarcity in our language of the feminine or double rhymes; finally, that the use of the present participle is objectionable. This serious indictment against our writers, and our defective language having been formulated, Dr. Hüffer goes on to state that, his libretto represents the emphasization of a difference of system, and he points with becoming modesty to his Corsican Love Song, as a satisfactory specimen of art workmanship. Space will not admit of a minute examination of these various charges, so they must perforce be noticed with brevity. As a tree is judged by its fruits, so must the Doctor's libretto be judged by the canons he has laid down, combined with common-sense, and good taste.

A perusal of the Book of Words conveys to one's mind the idea that it has been translated from the German, rather than adapted direct from the French. This impression is further strengthened by the construction of some of the sentences, by the many un-English expressions used, by the odd condemnation "of the objectionable present participle," and further, by the remembrance of the nationality of our author. A few words on the participle question. Dr. Hüffer is evidently unaware that the English present participle is far more elastic than the German. In the latter language it is very rarely used, except adjectively adverbially, or the infinitive of the verb takes its place; in addition to these common variants, other modifications of the sentence are made where we should employ the participle. For instance; the Germans cannot literally translate so simple a phrase as, "Hearing him cry, I ran to him"; they must change it into, "I heard him to cry and ran to him" (Ich hörte ihn schrein und lief zu ihm). "Reading good books," must run, "The to read of good books"; "The art of writing," is strictly, "The art to write." Such sentences as "The art of living," and "Up and be doing," samples of strong and good uses of our participle, find no German equivalent. From these examples one can understand how difficult it is for Germans who have not attained a mastery of our language to know when and how to employ our present participle. Herr Hüffer in his wisdom thinks that this is the fault of the unfortunate participle, but others better informed will maintain that this is the fault of the imperfectly educated man. There is no need to refute his supposition that we are poor as to "words for music." When he has time to search, a rapid glance from Shakespeare down to to-day will probably cause him to alter his opinion. While agreeing with him that the language of a libretto should be the language of common sense, it should be pointed out that all opera is conventional, more or less. Though we should laugh over the talking dragons, magic swords, love potions, and thaumaturgical birds, with which certain German operas are adorned, preferring rather dramas of purely human interest, yet in opera we require a certain amount of romance, and with it, flexibility and a greater freedom of language than is current in matter-of-fact life. Herr Hüffer laments the rare employment of so-called feminine rhymes in English, but little real loss is sustained over their restricted use. He condemns mannerisms of diction; and rightly so. Mannerism shows poverty of ideas. On page 12 of his libretto, within the space of a few lines, we find the term "murderous brood" used four times, "murderous hand" twice, and "murderous plot" once, while the word "blood" is employed no fewer than eight times. Such mannerisms are decidedly bad, and betray a singular lack of invention.

"Say whose is all this lovely luggage?
Hands off, if you please, you ancient baggage!"

"Until her father's purple stream."

"While I attend to the affairs of state,
And vainly try, with diplomatic ability,
To win the king some hearts, I grieve that your ability
Of public speech has left me to my fate."

"The air of this unhappy island
Is loud as with ill-omened raven's voices."

"Tell him no longer he must tarry
Nor let the shame on our foreheads burn;
Like the royal eagle, he must return
And scare the vultures from their nest;
And with beak and talons that none can parry,
Tear open the hearts of the murderous brood,
Taking life for life, and blood for blood;
That our father's spirit may be at rest,
And the voice of our sorrow drowned in the cries
Of the widowed wives of our enemies!"

"One terrible night
Has blighted all the blossoms of my youth,
And what remains is void of scent and sweetness,
Even as these withered flowers of yester-year.
But what boots it to think!"

"The time is near
When the harvest of murderous seed will appear."

"Father, be with me in this hour of need;
Restrain my hand from soiling our fair fame
With an assassin's venomous blood."

"But this one is safe, he will never rise;
See the bullet-hole right between his eyes;
His villanous tongue will not wag again.
Hallo! here is another one slain,
As dead as a nail. This indeed is sport
A lying lawyer to each barrel.
I call this an excellent retort."

"Say of Love shall he change or alter,
Shall he decay or shall he diminish?
Doomed from his birth to stagger and falter,
Doomed in the end to fail and to finish."

Here is the condemned Della Cruscanism with a vengeance! Space cannot be spared for more extracts. Enough are given to show the extraordinary character of our suggested reformation style. Some lines contain too many, some too few feet; they will rarely scan, and the supposed rhymes are indeed fearful and wonderful. The ludicrous ideas conjured up, and the grotesque language employed are even more absurd than the rubbish to be found in the translations of Italian opera formerly made for the delectation of unlinguistic English people, who desired to know what was taking place on the stage. Herr Hüffer sneers at Bunn and Fitzball, signalling out for special ridicule, "Now good red wine we will be drinking." However, at page 11 of his libretto we find the following line :—

"Rejoice with me, friends, for my brother at last has come;
To unravel the truth he has come," again :—

"Like the royal eagle he will return."

and :

"When her friends round the body were assembling."

It will be here seen that the disdainful critic uses precisely the same form of construction (German) as that of the old despised librettists. How their shades must chuckle over this sublime inconsistency! Space will not permit to call attention to the peculiarities of Herr Hüffer's grammar. He has doubtless struggled manfully with the difficulties of English prosody, especially the prepositions and pronouns, but the latter mentioned parts of speech have occasionally been too much for him. There are antecedents lost to view amidst a mass of secondaries, and relatives of so obscure and bigamous a disposition, that they are quite ready to agree with any person or thing preceding them. Such are :—

"The song which on the burial-day
The Signora Colomba did sing and say
When her friends round the body were assembling,
And which no Barracini hears without trembling."

"No joy of song is left me,
For the vulture has bereft me
Of the mate I cherished aye,
Piercing his heart, mine he cleft me."

As for the double and triple rhymes he claims credit for in the Corsican Love Song, there are no triple rhymes to be found, for "say to her" and "nay to her," is certainly not a true specimen, and of the ordinary rhymes, it must be pointed out that "vendetta" and "faldetta" are foreign words which we term identities, and not true rhymes. The same observation will apply to "dignity" and "malignity," "ability" and "affability," "frightened" and "enlightened," "consolation" and "notion," "intended" and "offended," "assembling" and "trembling," amongst other examples. Attention should also be called to the very large number of foreign words usually employed. Why is "pomi d'oro" written instead of "tomatos," "faldetta" for "mantle" and "macchia" for "the bush"?; and further, why do the chorus (who elsewhere sing in English) suddenly branch into Italian for five lines, lauding their elected Queen of the May in words which are a blasphemous travesty of a Roman Catholic antiphon? The Latin chant of the monks is of course admissible.

From what has already been written, the "benevolent" reader will perceive, that despite the arrogant self-assertion of Herr Hüffer's preface, he has not proved his ability to write good English, or flowing verses adapted for music; nor are his lines free from the reproaches he has thrown on those of other writers. Of course he knows us too well to write the ridiculous stuff that one Hans Von Wolzogen put forth last year as a translation of "The Nibelungen Ring" for the performance of Wagner's operas. Fortunately, the words of an opera are of far less importance than is the music associated with them; this is a thesis that may be safely maintained in spite of the new "unity" theory. But having said this much, let us be just and grant a measure of credit to the Times critic for his work. He has failed to reproduce the delicate nuances of Mérimée's tale, but the task of putting such a work into a narrative form is a very difficult one. Dr. Hüffer possesses little true poetic feeling, and seems to be entirely ignorant of the lyrical value of alliteration. There is some tedious padding in the work, but his framework is mostly good, and the dramatic character of the opera furnishes the musical composer with just those valuable situations which Mr. Mackenzie has promptly seized, and illustrated with such signal success.

The detailed notice of the music must be deferred until the next issue.

T. L. SOUTHGATE.

Mr. John Stedman's large circle of friends will heartily rejoice in learning, that after a serious illness, which has kept him away from the personal performance of his duties, he will return to town and resume his many responsible engagements next week. Mr. Stedman's restoration to health will be a matter of general congratulation in the musical world; for he has not only won the confidence of the many connected with him as a skilled and experienced concert agent and artist, but he has secured on all sides an enviable reputation as an excellent and very estimable man.

Passing Events.

Amateur Work for April gives the plan and outlines of the violin upon the Stradivarius model.

Mr. George H. L. Edwards announces his Twelfth Evening Concert, to be given at the Town Hall, Poplar, on Monday next, 23rd inst.

A "Musical Evening" was given by the students of the Surrey County School of Music (Principal: Mr. W. Lemare), on April 18th.

At the Annual Conversazione of the Church Guilds Union, at the Holborn Town Hall, April 11th, some good music was given, including organ solos by Mr. Victor Gollmick, part-songs, etc.

The last recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute is to be given on April 28th, by Dr. A. L. Peace of Glasgow. Vocalist Miss Clara Dowle, and violin Miss Marie Schumann, both of the Guildhall School of Music.

Messrs. Willis and Co. have erected a fine and very effective organ in the large new church at the Dominican Priory, Maitland Park, Haverstock Hill. This notably fine church will be shortly opened, and church music of a high order will it is expected be heard there.

At the Stratford Musical Festival held last Friday and Saturday, Miss Adela Duckham, aged 8½ years (who recently was awarded a Corporation Exhibition at the Guildhall School of Music), competed in two classes, and in one for pianoforte solo playing (34 competitors) won a first prize, and in the other for pianoforte sight playing (8 competitors) gained a first-class certificate (second prize).

The Richter Concerts at St. James's Hall will take place on the following Mondays: May 7, 14, 21, 28, June 4, 11, 18, 25, and July 2. The programmes include an "In Memoriam" Wagner selection on the first night, and a choice selection of instrumental and vocal works by Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Schumann, Berlioz, Cherubini, Raff, and sundry living writers.

At the Boston Symphony Concerts, under the direction of Herr Henschel, a Wagner "memorial concert" was given on the 17th ult. The programme included the Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell, the "Siegfried Idyll," the air "Dich, theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," two movements from "Die Meistersinger," the Prelude to "Parsifal," and the Funeral March from "Gotterdämmerung."

The work already accomplished, and now being accomplished by the College of Organists, London, has been and is of a highly valuable character. The number of its members is steadily on the increase, and embraces organists in all countries. The aim has always been to keep up the profession of music in one of its most important branches, and this has been attained by the strict examination those desiring to add the initials F. C. O. after their names, have had to submit to. Such favoured persons must not only play the organ in a capable manner, but must know something about orchestration, counterpoint and fugue, musical history and acoustics. It must be conceded that such musicians scattered everywhere, and labouring in the cause of high art, cannot help but exert a great influence for good upon all with whom they come in contact.—New York Courier.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, under Signor Randegger's direction, gave a concert on April 14th, at St. James' Hall. The programme included that famous stock piece of the choir, Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," a work which is ever welcome. A new part song by Mr. Caldicott was given with great and deserved success. It is entitled "Winter Days," and has been selected for the competition of choirs at the approaching Eisteddfod at Cardiff. Another pleasing novelty was Mr. J. C. Ward's vocal trio "Hope," which was sung by the Misses Robertson and Mr. J. Robertson, with obbligato concertina accompaniments by the composer and Messrs. Chidley. A third novelty was a graceful and melodious part song, entitled "My Lady Comes," composed by Signor Pinsuti expressly for the choir. The solo vocalists already named contributed other performances, and the vocal music was relieved by Senor Sarasate's admirable violin playing, and pianoforte pieces brilliantly executed by M. Pachmann.

QUERIES.

WALTZES.—There are three well-known waltzes, "Schusuchts, Schmerzens, and Hoffnungs," published by various firms, and ascribed to Beethoven. I seem to have read somewhere that the waltzes are more probably by Schubert, and shall be glad to know if they appear in any authentic list of the former composer's works. Can any correspondent refer me to a printed copy of the old waltz, of which I give the initial figure:—

J. B. S.

PRODUCTION OF THE VOICE.—I should be glad if I could ascertain, through the medium of the Musical Standard, what book there is to explain the production of the voice, and where published?—E. A. T.

OBOE.—I should be glad to have the names of one or two of the best oboe tutors (for self-instruction), with the publishers, and prices (moderate?—A. REED.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Overture, "Egmont" ..... Beethoven.
Scena, "From my soul's depths" ("Paradise Lost") ..... Rubinstein.
Mr. Egbert Roberts.
(His first appearance at these concerts.)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, No. 1, in G .. Max Bruch.
Senor Sarasate.
Symphony No. 2, in D (Op. 73) ..... Brahms.
Song, "Bright star of night" ..... Spohr.
Mr. Egbert Roberts.
Solos for Violin ..... Sarasate.
Romanza and Habanera.
Senor Sarasate.
Scotch Rhapsody, No. 1 ..... Mackenzie.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

The above programme is by no means unattractive, and with Sarasate as solo violinist, a larger audience might reasonably have been expected. We are now, however, approaching a time of year when the counter attractions of the beautiful Crystal Palace gardens, together with the want of ventilation in the concert-room, are sufficient to account for the gradual falling off in the attendance at these concerts. At all times the atmosphere of the concert-room is more or less trying, but on a bright sunny day one feels half suffocated, patiently remaining in a semi-comatose state to the end of the programme, rather than miss the symphony, which is not unfrequently at the very end.

Some six years ago Sarasate performed Max Bruch's concerto No. 1 at the Crystal Palace, and the favourable impression it made at that time was greatly increased on Saturday last. The first movement is imposing, and contains many beautiful and effective points, and the hand of the accomplished musician is shown in its masterly development. The adagio—when played as it was by Sarasate—seems like the embodiment of a prayer. It is full of feeling, and the violins, 'celli, oboi, and corni, in their turn sing in perfect sympathy with the solo instrument, and anon respond to it in a very charming manner. The last movement is brilliant and fantastic, and the thematic treatment is bold and masterly. The performance both of orchestra and soloist was so perfect, that only an extra bilious critic could complain of anything. Sarasate was at the end twice recalled. Later on he played his own Romanza and Habañera, and met with the usual double round of applause, in response to which he gave one of his celebrated gipsy effusions. Under the like circumstances his accomplished contemporary, Dr. Joachim, might have given us one of Sebastian Bach's inspirations by way of contrast. An occasional gipsy piece is all very well, but Senor Sarasate unfortunately gives us so many of that description, that we at times long for something more substantial.

Brahms's splendid Symphony, No. 2 in D, is admired by even those adverse critics who look upon his compositions as "too learned and overwrought." It may not occur to them that learning and inspiration are by no means incompatible, and that Beethoven himself was, amongst other things, accused of over-elaboration in his grand Choral Symphony.

Mr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody, No. 1, is not in so "advanced" a style as his No. 2, and in consequence met with much greater success.

Mr. Egbert Roberts, who on this occasion made his first appearance at these concerts, exhibited a fine voice, but he has evidently much to learn before he can use it to advantage.

R. S.

THE BROUSIL CONCERTS.

At the 4th "musical afternoon," held by Miss Bertha and Mr. A. J. Brousil, on April 19th, were performed Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor. Mdlle. Wurm conducted both these works with consummate ability; the strings were held by Messrs. Collins, Channel, and Brousil. Mdlle. Wurm selected for her pianoforte solo Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, Op. 27, No. 2; and Mr. J. A. Brousil a violoncello piece of Servais, a fantasia entitled "Le Désir." The Brousils will hold a grand matinée at St. James' Hall on Thursday, May 10th.

THE WESTERN COUNTIES' MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The above association held its sixth annual festival at Exeter, on Thursday, April 19th. In the afternoon Haydn's "Creation" was performed at the Victoria Hall. Never before had the oratorio been produced on such a scale in Exeter. Professionals of high rank were engaged for the solos; the chorus parts were sustained by a choir of 360 voices, and the orchestral accompaniments were rendered by a band of nearly 60 performers (including 25 professionals). It is needless to say that with such an array of professional and amateur talent under his control, Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus.Bac., succeeded in securing for the patrons of the festival a gratifying performance.

The soloists engaged in the oratorio were Mdme. E. Wynne, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. Santley. The composition of the chorus was 140 trebles, 90 alti, 60 tenors, and 70 basses. These had practised at the following branch centres:—Bampton, Budleigh Salterton, Exeter, Exmouth, Honiton, Newton, North Devon, Silverton, Taunton, Teignmouth, Tiverton, Torquay, and Wellington. Mr. Vinnicombe presided at the organ. The sixty instrumentalists forming the band included 11 first violins, 11 second violins, 7 violas, 7 violoncellos, 5 contra bassi, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 3 trombones, 2 trumpets, 1 timpani.

The performance as a whole was a very satisfactory one. The band did its work throughout in almost unexceptionable style. Mr. Vinnicombe deserves mention for his skilful playing of the organ accompaniment; the support of the recitatives was in some instances left entirely to him, and in these cases his good taste and judgment were well displayed. The choruses went magnificently; only in a very few places was any symptom of unsteadiness noticed; and when anything of the kind occurred—as in the opening of "The Heavens are telling," and in starting the allegro movement in the final number, "Sing the Lord, ye Voices all"—Mr. Wood quickly succeeded in rectifying the error. The soloists were not heard at their best. Mdme. Edith Wynne was evidently suffering from a bad cold; however, she struggled bravely against the disadvantage under which she was labouring, and was frequently rewarded with warm applause. Mr. Guy was in fairly good voice, and sang well. Mr. Santley, like the soprano, seemed to be suffering from a cold. Mr. Bridson did well in the duets in the third part. Reverting to the work of the chorus, it may be observed that while some disappointment was expressed at the failure of the soloists to come up to the standard expected of them, not a word was heard in disparagement of the chorus. Mr. Wood, of course, deserves much credit for the effective control which he wielded over such a large number of vocalists whom he rarely meets in a body; but praise must also be given to the branch choirmasters, to whose careful training is obviously due much of the success which attended the performances of the choruses in the afternoon. Mr. G. M. Rice led the orchestra with his accustomed skill; and the excellent work done by the leading 'cello and oboe deserves acknowledgment.

Barnett's music to Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" made up the first, and a miscellaneous selection the second part of the evening programme. The principals were Mdme. Wynne, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Bridson. These artists brought their best powers to bear on the theme; the band, on the whole, was satisfactory, and the chorus highly efficient. Far more hearty enthusiasm was aroused by this performance than by its predecessor in the afternoon. Mr. Guy delivered the recitatives and airs allotted to him with much taste. "The fair breeze blew," and the last solo, "The seraph band," earned for Mdme. Wynne sterling marks of approval. Miss Mackenzie sang the sweet contralto air, "O sleep, it is a gentle thing," with the genuine sympathetic expression for which she is remarkable. The bass music was given with masterly effect by Mr. Bridson. The duet, "Two voices in," by Mdme. Wynne and Miss Mackenzie, was one of the most charming things of the evening, while the quartets gave unequivocal satisfaction, the final, "Sweeter than the marriage feast," and the concluding chorus being sung in a style worthy alike of the performers and the music. To Mr. D. J. Wood's conductorship too much praise cannot be accorded, nor should it be forgotten that the success of the festival was enhanced by the judicious organ accompaniments of Mr.

E. M. Vinnicombe. The second part of the evening's programme introduced Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, by Mr. M. G. Rice and the orchestra. Mr. Rice had twice to rise in deference to the rounds of hearty plaudits with which the performance was greeted. Mr. Santley sang Gounod's "Medjé" and M. V. White's "Devout Lover" with the warmth and expression of an artist of the first grade. Applause was enthusiastic and unanimous after each song, and encores were being demanded until Mr. Wood, in a brief appeal to the audience, pointed out that to comply with their wishes would upset the train arrangements of many persons in the orchestra, as well as in the body of the hall. Schumann's "Gipsy Life," with full chorus and band, produced with commendable precision and effect, terminated the concert, during the latter portion of which Miss Lizzie Hicks played the pianoforte accompaniments in a praiseworthy and musician-like manner.

It speaks well for the musical resources of the West, that of the large and efficient orchestra only two members came from London, the first flute and first horn.

MR. AGUILAR'S RECITALS.

At his third and last recital on Monday afternoon, the Egyptian darkness caused by a passing storm of sleet, almost prevented the reading of notes where music-books were required. Mr. Aguilar played (mostly out of book) for about an hour and a half. The scheme included Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in B flat; Chopin's Nocturne in B major (Op. 62, No. 1); Sir Sterndale Bennett's "Three musical sketches" in E major, E minor, and B major (inscribed to Mr. J. W. Davidson), and the Abbé Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" No. 12, in C sharp minor and D flat major, whereof the peculiar vagueness and uncouth style is partly but barely redeemed by a pretty and plausible Hungarian tune. Musicians who read may have noticed, and some did notice, in this strange rhapsody, truly and etymologically so-called, a remarkable reminiscence of Donizetti's motif in "Lucia di Lammermoor," the dying speech of poor sentimental Edgardo, "fra poco a mí." Equally odd, a far greater man in every respect, Schubert, who died (A.D. 1828) before Donizetti was "born" or at least much thought of, had anticipated the same idea in that pretty symphonic prelude of four bars to the "Morgengrüss" (Morning greeting) of Schubert in C major, transcribed for the pianoforte by Stephen Heller. Mr. Aguilar's own compositions included his fine and masterly Sonata in C major, of four movements, eulogized on previous occasions for its breadth of proportions, great variety of style, and able construction; "Last Look," and "Away"; "Evening" in A flat, the "Valse Brillante" in A major, of which one is never tired, and an etude in A minor. Another of Mr. Aguilar's accomplished young lady pupils, Miss Helen Matthey, had the honour to be entrusted with Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien" in B flat, a piece of great difficulty, because complex, full of tonal changes, and varieties of rhythm. Miss Matthey is thought, by connoisseurs, to have acquitted herself, as a girl in her teens, very creditably, and with considerable savoir faire, thanks to her "master of arts," or the "art,"—one quite sufficient! An eminent musician and professor (whose esteemed name may not be mentioned) expresses his opinion as follows:—"Miss Helen Matthey, a pupil of Mr. Aguilar, made a most successful first appearance en amateur, performing Schumann's difficult piece (already entitled) with remarkable self-possession, for one so young, and earning great credit, both for herself and her excellent instructor. We look forward with pleasure to hearing this young lady again." The "Faschingsschwank," a fanciful piece of festive character, for it literally means "Carnival Pranks," is an early work, and remarkable, like Schumann's "Kreisleriana," "Carnival" proper, "Humoreske," and "Wald Scenen," for strict adherence to flat keys, chiefly B flat, A flat, F major, D minor, and G minor. A lady complained to the writer, this very week, of a gavotte (by a foreign composer) written in C flat major and A flat minor—seven flats at the signature; but most English writers for the pianoforte are prone to use keys with at least five flats at the signature; the French, on the other hand, seem to prefer the sharp keys, certainly for their chamber songs.

Mr. Aguilar will not resume his excellent recitals before next Christmas, and nobody just now looks forward to another December without shivering and shaking, like 'the man that could never get warm." A. M.

SENOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

Senor Sarasate's second concert, on April 19, was not so fully attended as the first, but it passed off triumphantly. Senor Sarasate's reading of Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor had already been appreciated, as he has played it this season both at the Philharmonic Concerts and at the Crystal Palace. This reading is thought by connoisseurs to be far more satisfactory than the interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto in D, where, as musical opinions go, the brilliant violinist merged the text too much in what Kant and Fichte call the ego, or the "subjective." The cadenza, moreover, struck everyone as poor, trivial, and no recapitulation whatever of the movement in question.

Senor Sarasate's solos, at the second concert, were his own Fantasia on "Faust," and his "Bohemian Airs." I concur with a caustic (daily) contemporary in denouncing the "Faust" piece as utter and unmitigated trash, unworthy alike of the text and the player. The satirical writer says that the applause would have been far louder if Senor Sarasate, after the "Salvation Army" fashion, had played the piece standing on his head! The "Gipsy" airs were encored, and a Spanish Dance substituted. Nothing can be finer than Senor Sarasate's style; or more brilliant than his executancy; or more ear-piercing than his delicate tone. The piano passages are so subdued, that the proverbial pin might fairly be heard to fall on the floor! But the Senor is a "virtuoso" par excellence, and people find fault with him for playing too much out of the same "book." A third concert, in the afternoon, is already announced. Dr. Sloman will speak of M. Sarasate's doings at Sydenham on Saturday.

It is only due to Mr. W. G. Cusins to notice a capital performance, by his Philharmonic band, of Beethoven's 5th Symphony and the overture to "Oberon." Two pretty ballet airs from Rubinstein's opera "Le Démon," the fiasco of the Royal Italian Opera season in 1881, were also played in the second part. A. M.

MISS ZIMMERMANN'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann, although of German origin, was educated at our own Royal Academy of Music, of which she is an honourable, as well as an honorary member. Her status as a pianist is established by the fact that Miss Zimmermann is always engaged to play several times in the course of every season at the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts, both as soloist and as conductor of pianoforte trios, quartets, and quintets. The writer remembers to have heard her, some years ago, at Mr. Ella's "Musical Union," a sort of "Epsom Race" ground, so to speak, where blue ribbons were to be worn, and where merely to appear with fair success was a gold medal of merit.

Miss Zimmermann held the first of three serial chamber concerts at the Tenterden Street Rooms on the evening of April 19th, when she conducted Mr. C. Villiers Stanford's Sonata in D, Op. 11, for pianoforte and violin (Herr Straus), and Rubinstein's Quintet in G minor, Op. 99, of which the string parts were played by MM. Straus, Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze. Miss Zimmermann's solo was Schumann's well-known "Fantasia," in C, Op. 17, marked by a motto of Frederick Schlegel to the effect that through all sounds, in a variegated earth-dream, penetrates a "still small voice" (ein leiser Ton), for which the ear of one in retirement or seclusion listens intently.

Mr. Villiers Stanford's sonata, the only novelty of the concert, has a bright and unaffected character. The first movement in D, 3-4 time, has been quite built on the orthodox plan; the second is a charming, simple melody in G, common time, with two variations and a long episode in the tonic minor, ending with a sort of minuet movement of the original theme. The finale, an allegretto in D, 2-4 time, is also of a gay style, and introduces excerpts from the slow movement, both the major and minor themes happily combined.

The Rubinstein quintet, a fine work, would be improved by curtailment; I esteem the best movements to be the inner ones, a moderato in C minor and major, and an andante variazioni in E flat. These variations, of very charming character, lose effect from their prolixity. Mdme. Sophie Lowe sang six lieder of Schubert and Schumann with the usual taste. The second concert is fixed for May 8th. A. M.

CHURCH MUSIC AT KENSINGTON.

At St. Matthias, South Kensington, the services are very "musical," and after a laudably short "matins," of about one hour (sermon inclusive), a choral communion is celebrated. The texts of the great masters, and Schubert especially, are freely drawn upon. On Sunday last, the organist, Mr. Mallit Jones, produced a new "Communion Service" in D major, composed by Mr. Frank L. Moir. This comprehends all the movements of the regular "Mass," set to English words. The work is much admired, and a formal review of the score (published by Novello, Ewer, and Co.) will appear in due course. Mr. Mallit Jones conducted the service with consummate ability.

GRAND FESTIVAL CONCERT AT ALBERT HALL.

On Saturday afternoon, April 21 (not the regular "St. George's Day"), Mr. Carter gave a grand English concert at Albert Hall. His own choir and the band of the Scots Guards sang and played several times. English songs, good and indifferent, were rendered by Mdme. Patey, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. V. Rigby, Signor Foli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Miss Patti Winter, and Miss Hilda Wilson (a protégée of Mrs. Ellicott and a charming contralto). Mr. Poznanski played, as violin solos, his own "Fantaisie Pathétique," with great success, and M. Jacobs, of Brussels, a fine violoncellist, made a début of the most satisfactory kind in Schubert's Valse, as arranged by Servais.

MR. NICHOLAS MORI'S OPERA COMIQUE,

"PATTY, OR THE SHIPWRIGHT'S LOVE."

At a miscellaneous concert given at 12, Chepstow Place, Bayswater, on Thursday, April 19th, by the kind permission of J. P. Larkins, Esq., the principal feature was the production of a new opéra comique, the music composed by Mr. Mori, and performed by some of the admirably trained pupils of that gentleman. From so experienced an artist one expected a well-written musicianly work, but was hardly prepared for so many sparkling and charming melodies, which, supported by a background of able scholastic writing, constituted a pleasing, graceful work. Now that Mr. Carl Rosa has so enthusiastically and successfully taken up the cause of English opera, let us hope that other managers may be led to do the same, and they will find that there are many works by English composers that claim a hearing. The singing of Madame Reeves and of other artists was indeed admirable.

FALMOUTH.

The Falmouth Choral Society gave its first concert in the Polytechnic Hall, on Tuesday, April 17th, in aid of the "Cornwall Home for Destitute Girls." The Hall was crammed, the whole of the body having been occupied by reserved seats. The first part consisted of "The May Queen" (Sir Sterndale Bennett). Second part, miscellaneous :—

Mrs. Trelease, R.A.M.	May Queen.
Mr. W. Hearder (Plymouth)	The Lover.
Lieut.-Col. Carlyon	Robin Hood.
Miss H. K. Broad	The Queen.
Mr. W. G. Bishop	Pianoforte.
Mr. J. Pardew (Plymouth)	Harmonium.
Hon. Conductor	Mr. C. W. Robinson.

The concert was a great success, all the performers rendering their respective parts in a manner which evidently gratified the large audience. The "May Queen" choruses, as also the unaccompanied part-songs in the second part, were sung with excellent precision, and with a due regard to light and shade by the class. Mr. J. Parsons's violin solo cavatina (F. N. Lohr), accompanied by Mr. Robinson, was redemanded, as was also the trio for violoncello, pianoforte and harmonium "Meditation," Bach and Gounod, by Messrs. H. and A. Mulder, and Mr. Robinson, Mrs. Trelease also won an encore for "Bid me discourse," and Signor Bechonini for "Infelice." Twenty pounds will be handed over to the charitable institution for which the concert was given. At the last practice the class presented Mr. C. W. Robinson with an ivory bâton, gold mounted, and inscribed.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. E. Gye begins his season on Tuesday next, May 1, with a very strong company, which includes Mdme. Adelina Patti, Mdme. Albani, Signor Nicolini, and most of the old "principals." Mdme. Christine Nilsson's engagement is only, at present, a possibility. The director promises, as a positive novelty, the opera of Ponchielli, "Gioconda," which, brought out at La Scala, Milan, in 1876 (rather a long time ago), has been popular ever since. But what is popular with the Italians may not succeed so well in England, where Wagnerian principles are now rather in the ascendant. Signor Ponchielli, however, although he moves with the Italian groove, is said to have Wagnerian "tendencies."

Mr. Gye also promises Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" and "Il Comte Ory," with "Le Domino Noir" of Auber. The season will only last twelve weeks.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The short season came to an end last Saturday night, when Mr. Carl Rosa, the director, took his place in the conductor's seat, and of course was cordially hailed.

The opera, "Mignon," is well known, both in its English and Italian dress. Madame Marie Roze has invested the title part with a charming significance; first, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1879, and since, at the "Opera in English," of Mr. Carl Rosa. On Saturday, Mdme. Roze finished the season with éclat. A débutante, Miss Leighton, achieved a promising success as Filina; she has a light flexible soprano voice, and prepossessing presence. The other parts were filled by Mr. L. Crotty, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Miss Josephine Yorke. The short season of four weeks has been one almost exclusively, not only of "opera in English," but English opera itself, par et absolu. Poor Wagner has not had a chance this time; more the pity! Mr. Carl Rosa, however, deserves praise for the production of two such English operas as "Colomba" and "Esmeralda," sufficiently discussed in these columns.

LEEDS.

Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's opera "Iolanthe" was performed at the Grand Theatre, on Monday and during the week. The company engaged by Mr. D'Oyly Carte for taking this opera round the provinces is a first-class one, and principals and chorus are thoroughly efficient. It is rather late in the day to discuss the merits of "Iolanthe," but the general opinion seems to be that in a musical point of view this opera is not equal either to the "Pinafore" or "Patience." At the same time it must be admitted that many of the numbers are melodious and beautiful, and there is no reason why "Iolanthe" should not keep the stage till the new opera promised by the same composers is brought out in London and the provinces. Miss Laura Clement makes a charming Phillis, and sings and acts with grace and refinement. Her song "For riches and rank I do not long," was well received, and she scored a success in her duet with Strephon (Mr. Federici), "None shall part us from each other." Miss Fanny Harrison, as the Fairy Queen, gave an excellent rendering of the pretty song "Oh, foolish fairy." Miss Beatrice Young was pleasing as Iolanthe, and sang with much expression her tuneful ballad "He loves! If the bygone years." Mr. Frank Thornton puts plenty of humour into the part of the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Geo. Marler, as Private Willis was loudly applauded for his fine rendering of the song at the beginning of Act 2, "When all night long," &c. The pretty chorus of fairies in Act 1, as well as the effective quartet in Act 2, were all given in capital style, and the scenery, costumes, &c., left nothing to be desired.

On Saturday evening last the borough organist gave the sixth of his "Hours with the great Composers," the master with whom the large audience spent a delightful evening being Mendelssohn. The programme was good and interesting, and embraced the military band overture in C, "The Lover's Duet," from the "Songs without Words," the organ Sonata in C minor, a selection from the two-part songs, "The Pilgrim's March" from the Italian Symphony, the "Andante from the violin concerto, which was played with much taste and effect, and finally the "Wedding March" from "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

THE BLOOMSBURY CHURCH CHOIR UNION.

The first festival of this new choral combination was held at the church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, on April 19th. In the prospectus of the association the following words occur, which describe the position and proposals of the new choral corporation.

The scheme of each year's work includes meetings at each of the Churches represented by the several Choirs, and an Annual Festival taking place between Easter and Whitsuntide.

The immediate government of the Association is vested in the hands of a Committee, formed of the different Church Organists, together with a representative from each Choir of the Union.

The Committee and Association are earnestly engaged in endeavouring to secure the most perfect possible performance of the service Music chosen, and the most devotional rendering of the more general features of a properly-conducted Choral Service.

The success of the first festival showed clearly enough the earnestness of all engaged. During the past few months, meetings for drill in the music chosen for the year, have been held in the churches of St. Giles, St. George, Bloomsbury, St. George the Martyr, and Christ Church, Woburn Square, the choirs of which belong to the B.C.C.U. The selection of music for the festival deserves special notice, as displaying sound judgment and a wide recognition of the multiform types of Church music finding acceptation in the Anglican Church. Of course, the so-called "Tallis Festal" responses were used; the Psalm chants included good specimens by Crotch and Goss; Henry Smart's fine Service in F was sung; Haydn's Motet, now in use with the English words, "Distracted with care," &c., and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus, were the anthems given, the latter being sung at the end of the service. The hymns selected were typical specimens of their kind, both verbally and musically. The first was "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven," to the dignified tune by Goss in the S.P.C.K. collection; the next was "Jesu, my Lord, my God, my all," to Barnby's expressive setting; and during the offertory "O Worship the King, all glorious above" was sung to the strongly built, good old tune, "Hanover." Before and after the service some very admirably rendered organ-music, including Mendelssohn's first sonata, was played by Mr. Constantine and Mr. W. G. Wood, of St. George the Martyr and Christ Church, Bloomsbury. The service was accompanied by Mr. H. Walmsley Little, Mus.Bac., organist of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, with masterly tact, judgment, and skill, and with such courage and care as minimised to an almost imperceptible degree the difficulties arising from the serious distance between the choir and organ. The choristers numbered between 90 and 100. The parts were fairly balanced, save that, perhaps, the alto might have gained from the presence of a few more voices, as is too often the case at Church choral festivals; although the part was, upon this occasion, by no means ineffective, and at times told well. No marked flaw of any kind disturbed the excellent, careful rendering and even flow of the service music, and the singing reflected the highest credit upon the choristers. The responses gained much by the exercise of that desire to secure a devotional enunciation of the whole of the music in an earnest as well as in an artistic manner. If the B.C.C.U. will only firmly keep to the front the admirable proposal to study Church music, with an anxious wish to combine devotional earnestness with artistic excellence, the association will, indeed, not only claim, but will have, the support of all right-minded Churchmen and lovers of ecclesiastical music. Throughout the performance of the Service on the 19th the intonation was good, and only in very rare instances was there any tendency to get out of tune; and this was observable only once or twice even in the boys' part. The general precision was extremely satisfactory. It would be impossible, one thought, on hearing upon this occasion the nervous, dignified sentences, and strong, compact harmonies of Smart in F, heartily and well sung, to name any more characteristic and solid English Church music than this notable work affords. The sympathy of the clergy, churchwardens, and leading inhabitants was shown by their presence; and the kind forethought of the churchwardens and officials of St. Giles, &c., in making efficient arrangements for the reception of the choristers and for the conduct of the service calls for special recognition. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. F. Buller, M.A., and the lessons read by the Rev. N. Bromley and the Rev. J. J. Glendinning Nash, M.A. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Nisbet, rector of St. Giles; and it was an excellent specimen of well-considered pulpit oratory, well adapted for the occasion, its materials being well condensed and not weakened or dispersed by over-much argumentation; and the good points being earnestly, tersely, eloquently, and briefly placed before the hearers.

Canon Nisbet preached from the text II. Chronicles xxix., 30; Colossians iv., 16. He said:—

It is needless that I should dilate to you upon the importance of music as an appropriate accessory of public worship, for your presence here this evening admits it.

It is needless that I should speak of the cultivation of music as a sacred art, for it is an accomplished fact which you yourselves have proved.

"I think," says Luther, "that if David rose from the dead, he would wonder much to find how far we had advanced in music." If this were true in the 16th century, how much more so now? For the time has happily gone by of tame, frigid, drawling, tuneless, tasteless psalmody, for you have resolved to replace it by something which devout hearts may find a support and not a hindrance. It may, however, be well to remind you of some of the dangers to which you are specially liable, and some of the safeguards, by which you may ward off the evils which expose "this noble thing to vile using."

Respecting the dangers to which those are exposed who "invent to themselves instruments of music like unto David." There is the danger lest the attention should be too exclusively fixed on what I may term the mechanical execution of the art; if, for example, during the celebration of divine service, your thoughts are diverted from its main purpose (which is the worship of God) either excessively to admire the excellence with which it is rendered or possibly, to complain of the faults which accidentally mar it. So also there is a danger lest being sensibly moved by what is purely emotional, you mistake natural feeling for religious feeling. The natural emotions have doubtless a place in our constitution, and it would be an exaggeration to say that they were not to be rightly excited, but it is quite possible for them to be excited, and nothing more. You may rise above mere earthly things without reaching to heavenly; whereas, the tuneless song of the heart may mount to God's throne, while the pealing anthem rises no higher than the vaulted arches of the material building. Then there is another danger, which, as it still exists, must not be unmentioned; and unhappily, I could tell you of cases where I myself have known its pernicious effects. I refer to that vanity which is so easily engendered by proficiency in any art. The preacher may easily become vain of eloquence, real or supposed: the singer may also be elated and puffed up by the admiration which he receives. It is very hard indeed, to try and do your very best and excel in that which you attempt, sometimes without thinking of yourself and how well you do it.

I do not know how I should exactly draw the line between that legitimate pleasure which is allowable from doing anything well and that excessive self-elation which soon becomes the sin of vanity. But being forewarned of the danger, your conscience will generally tell you when you think more of the means than of the end, and consider your own glory rather than the honour of God.

There is one more danger (perhaps I ought to have placed it first, instead of last) for it often begins when the chorister is very young, and that is careless familiarity with things sacred, repeating the holiest words without thinking of their meaning. If the youngest often do this, the oldest of us would admit that we frequently do the same.

It is easy for the voice to say or to sing "My soul doth magnify the Lord." It is no easy thing for the soul itself to rise to such raptures.

I have reminded you of dangers common to all who take part in the services of the Sanctuary: perfunctory exactness, mere emotion, vanity and familiarity.

That these faults may not be found in us, let me say a few words of our safeguards.

Ever cultivate, i.e., studiously discipline your mind to a reverent and awful sense of the great God whom you attempt to worship. "He cannot worthily be praised." The very angels, sinless though they are, veil their faces in His presence. Realise, as far as you can, that presence, His greatness, His Power, His wisdom, His love. Let all these be thought of and adored. Stir up your minds by way of remembrance, and then, and then only, will you be moved to say "What shall I render to my God for all His benefits to me." "Reverence is the angel of the world," so said the renowned Shakespeare. "The least irreverence is the greatest unreason," so lately did I hear from the lips of a young and accomplished prince.

Next cultivate lowly humility. As reverence arises from the contemplation of God, so does humility spring from the consideration of ourselves. Let us ever bow ourselves before the Most High, not only as creatures, but as "miserable sinners" unworthy of the least of His gifts, deserving His displeasure but accepted by His forgiveness, redeemed by His Son, brought near to Him by His Spirit, reinstated into His favour, grafted into His Church, the vessels which he has formed for the reception of His highest attribute of mercy, and thus "fulfilled with His grace and heavenly benediction."

Lastly, let us seek from His spirit that fire of heartfelt fervour which shall kindle every gift we present. However beautiful the altar, there must be fire to give virtue to the sacrifice. Whatever our prayers may be, however feeble, faltering, imperfect, often lisped by stammering tongues, let them at any rate be heart-prayers, for good is the saying of Bishop Wilson: "They whose hearts desire nothing, pray for nothing." And whatever our praises (whether accompanied by mechanical exactness or not, whether embellished by artistic taste, or devoid of any such accessory), let these also be heart-praises, for good is the saying of John Bunyan: "Let thy heart be without words rather than thy words without heart."

These, then, being your dangers and your safeguards, we bid you God speed in this your good work. Though on your guard concerning it, be not afraid of it. Rejoice in it, take pleasure in it, go on in it, improve in it, reverently, humbly fervently. And, oh! may it be so from the youngest child in his linen ephod to the oldest among you, that you learn in your inmost hearts the old songs of Zion now, and prepare for "the new song of Moses and the Lamb" in the heavenly temple, where "you shall no more go out."

FARNHAM.—Handel's "Messiah" was effectively given, with orchestral accompaniments, before a crowded audience on April 10th. The chief singers were Mrs. Barrington Gore Browne, Miss Aylwin, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Rev. Clement Powell; organist, Mr. H. Piggott, L.Mus.T.C.L.; leader of the band, Mr. James Brown; conductor, Mr. J. Conway Brown, L.Mus.T.C.L.

SOUTHGATE.—The ninth annual dedication festival was celebrated at St. Michael's, Bowes Park, on Sunday last, the 22nd inst. The services throughout the day were fully choral, and the music included, morning Service, Garrett in D; evening, Stainer in F; anthem, "I will mention the loving kindness of the Lord," the tenor solo being sung with much taste by Mr. Chas. J. Murton. Mr. H. J. Baker presided, as usual, at the organ.

DOUGLAS, ISLE OF MAN.—Miss Wood's fifth popular musical entertainment of the season was given on April 19th. Solos were sung by local singers, and the artistic pianoforte playing of Mrs. Valentine added to the pleasure of the listeners. Miss Wood's classes took part in the performance of part-songs, &c. To the lady just named, much credit is due for her admirably directed and earnest labours in the cause of the art.

ERITH CHORAL SOCIETY.—A highly successful performance of the "Creation" was given at the Erith Public Hall on Friday, the 13th inst., under the direction of Mr. Rich. Lemaire. The soloists were Madam Worrell, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Pyatt. A stringed orchestral accompaniment added much to the success of the performance. The choruses were given with much precision and effect. Mr. Sidney Naylor presided at the pianoforte.

KIDDERMINSTER.—A highly successful concert was given at the Town Hall by the members of the Kidderminster Amateur Instrumental Society, assisted by a picked chorus of about forty voices, on the 5th inst., the programme, which included Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 2 Salomon set), selections from Mendelssohn's "Loreley," part-songs, overtures, &c., gave great satisfaction to a large and appreciative audience. Mr. C. Hayward led the band, and Mr. W. E. Wadely, F.C.O., conducted; after paying expenses, a balance of £15 will be handed over to the Parish Church Tower and Bells Fund.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.—The final subscription concert of the season will take place at St. James's Hall on Tuesday, May 1st, when, in addition to a repetition performance of Gade's "Psyche," the programme will contain selections from Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" (including the Rataplan chorus), Gounod's "Reine de Saba," and conclude with Schumann's "Gipsy Life." Mdme. Isabel Howitz will sustain the part of "Psyche," the other principal vocalists being Mesdames Giulia Warwick, A. Ehrenberg, and Ambler, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Arthur Thompson, and Frederick King. The orchestra will consist of nearly 300 performers, and be conducted by Mr. Willing.

MANCHESTER.—On April 16th the Athenæum Musical Society concluded its sixteenth season with an admirably selected miscellaneous programme. Especially were Smart's "The Shepherd's Lament," Mendelssohn's "The Nightingale," and the chaste and subdued interpretation of "The Wanderer's Night Song," excellent performances. The concert concluded with the fragments of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera "Loreley," which were sung with all the fire and vigour characteristic of the society. In the "Finale," and throughout the evening, the solo singing was as refined, musicianlike, and intelligent as is usual at the Athenæum concerts. Between the parts the ladies of the choir presented Dr. Hiles with a beautiful silver epergne as a mark of "their appreciation of his unremitting kindness and patience."

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—The first concert of the St. Paul's Institute Choral Society took place recently. The programme comprised Handel's "Ode to S. Cecilia's day," Mendelssohn's motet "Hear my Prayer," and a miscellaneous selection, including two movements from Beethoven's Symphony in C. The chorus numbered about eighty voices and the soloists were Miss Eleanor Farnol, Mr. G. H. Welch. The band was an excellent one, and was led by Mr. F. Ward. Mr. George A. Barnes officiated as organist, and Mr. A. B. Plant, Mus.Bac., Oxon, F.C.O., proved himself to be a painstaking and good conductor. The choruses throughout were well rendered, with an accuracy that bespoke careful and intelligent training. There is clearly a hopeful future before the young society.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S VOCAL ACADEMY.—The first of three concerts took place at the Steinway Hall on April 19th, when a goodly number of Mdme. Sainton's pupils gave abundant evidence of their excellent training. The programme included the following choruses for ladies' voices: "Glorious stand the mountains;" Reinthaler's "Jephtha;" "Ave Maria" (Marchetti); 'Song of the sunbeam," composed expressly for the class by Mr. W. Macfarren; "Our happy home" (first time of performance), Mdme. Sainton-Dolby; "Spinning Chorus," by desire, from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman"; and "Spring is the land" (Raff). Mr. Leipold was the accompanist, and M. Sainton the conductor. The remaining concerts are fixed for April 25th and December 3rd.

LUDLOW.—The Amateur Choral and Orchestral Society (president, the Rev. F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus.Doc.,) gave its second concert of the season on Tuesday evening, April 17th, when Hutchinson's new cantata, "Elaine," and a miscellaneous selection were performed. The soloists were Mdme. Clara West and Miss Lottie West, of London, Mr. H. Byolin, of Shrewsbury, and one or two local amateurs; leader of the band, Mr. T. Watkis; conductor, Mr. R. Bartholomew. Miss Lottie West greatly pleased the audience, being encored in two songs, "The Children's Home" and "Westbury Fair." Mr. H. Byolin met with a similar compliment in "Saved from the Storm," and Mdme. West was greatly applauded in all her efforts. Musically, if not financially, the concert was a great success.

OSWESTRY.—On April 21st the third annual festival of village choirs, held under the auspices of the Oswestry School of Music, took place at Oswestry. Under the presidency of Mr. Henry Leslie the Oswestry School of Music, founded in 1880, has had a prosperous career, and its festivals attract audiences from far and wide. Amongst those who took part in the festival were Lady Harlech, Mr. Alfred Scott Gatty and Mrs. Gatty, the Hon. G. Spencer Lyttelton, Mr. T. Ratliff, Mr. Lionel S. Benson, Mr. J. Spooner Hardy, and Mr. W. H. Leslie. The competition of village choirs under Government inspection for a prize of £4 resulted in the prize going to the Bronygarth choir. The first part of the programme terminated with the distribution of the prizes and certificates awarded for theoretical knowledge and sight-singing, the recipients receiving their prizes at the hands of the Marchioness of Londonderry. The competition of town choirs for the town banner, which was one of the principal attractions, brought out only one competitor—the Oswestry Philharmonic Society—which was adjudged worthy of the prize. The competition for town choirs under fifteen years' standing resulted in the prize being divided between Oswestry and Llanfyllin choirs, while the prize offered in the competition of town schools under Government inspection was divided between Oswestry National Schools. The chief event of the day was the competition of village choirs for "The Banner of Honour," a second prize, "The Ladies' Banner," also being offered. The prize was won by the Lodge and Brmygarth representatives; the second honours being taken by the Trefonan choir.

EALING CHORAL ASSOCIATION.—On Thursday last the Ealing Choral Association gave their last concert of the season at the Lyric Hall, which was well filled by an appreciative audience. This choral society has now become firmly established; it executes in a thoroughly artistic manner music of interest, and under its present conductor, Mr. Ernest Ford, enables its subscribers to become acquainted with not only the works of the great masters, but also, as was the case this evening, those of composers who are now making history. The cantata "Narcissus," by Massenet, was one of these; the antique idyll commences with a Hymn to Apollo, in which the clear fresh voices of the sopranos and contraltos seemed to revel. Miss Thudichum sang the part of Narcissus, and in the address to the "fountain," as well as where "he" is listening to the chanting of the water nymphs beneath the river, created an enthusiasm. In addition to this charming work, the Association distinguished themselves in one of Mendelssohn's cantatas, "Come, let us sing unto the Lord." Later in the evening they sang a remarkably dramatic chorus, "Liberty," by Eaton Faning, as well as that composer's popular "Song of the Vikings." Mr. Walter Clifford sang the "Valley," by Gounod, and gained an encore for "I fear no foe," by Pinsuti. Mr. George Cox, as well as singing the solo in Mendelssohn's cantata, sang Ernest Ford's song "Dawn," much improved on its original form by the violoncello accompaniment, played by Mr. Whitehouse. Mr. Cox's voice is improving, and he should be more often heard, as he sings with refinement and taste. The choir can be congratulated in having secured the services of Mr. Ernest Ford as conductor, whose Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and a chorus for female voices, "Springtime" (also encored), were included in the programme. The interest of the concert would have been enhanced had a book of words been sold, as, however distinct the choir might sing, it was difficult to follow the story of Narcissus or the subject of "Liberty."

Plymouth.—The committee under whose auspices the concert was given on April 18th, at the Plymouth Guildhall must indeed be sanguine men if the realisation did not exceed their highest expectations. Rarely has any concert in the Guildhall secured so well filled a house; the dress seats extended far down the room and were all filled by a highly respectable audience, while the balcony and area were thoroughly crowded. Mr. S. Weekes has secured, as he has assuredly deserved, many triumphs, and this concert was one of them. He conducted with quiet skill and command, the result being a performance of the greatest efficiency and attractiveness. The choral music was rendered with a steadiness and cultivated taste which was almost, except in two or three instances, absolutely perfect. The band was admirable; the organ, played by the Borough organist, Mr. J. Hele, Mus.Bac., greatly enhanced the effect of the choruses, and Mr. Pardew and Mr. Rice were admirably efficient as principal violinists. The choir were in great strength and admirable "form." Only once or twice was the least wavering perceptible. In the unaccompanied part-songs—the purity of tone, the perfect steadiness and precision, and intelligent expression once more evidenced that this society is unexcelled in this musical specialty. The solos were taken by professional artists. Mr. Santley was one, and although in his rendering of the airs "The seasons" he seemed at first suffering from slight huskiness, he rose to the full height of his reputation in singing in Gounod's "Nazareth," which was rendered as a solo and chorus. Closely following it in attractiveness was Mendelssohn's cantata, "The Thirteenth Psalm." Miss Mackenzie's vocalisation was tenderly and devoutly impressive, and the choral accompanying music was charming. Miss Mackenzie also won high honours in the second part, her songs being warmly applauded. Mr. Henry Guy was in particularly good voice, and pleased the audience. His scena, "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight" (Weber), was an especially fine performance. Mdme. Edith Wynne was most effective in her dramatic air, "Far greater in his lowly state" which was sung with fervour, and well illustrated her special power.

Mr. George Gear's Concert.—Mr. George Gear held his annual concert at St. George's Hall, on Tuesday evening, when he achieved a success quite worthy to be so called. This accomplished son of a veteran professor of the vocal art well known as Mr. Handel Gear, proved his proficiency as a composer for, and player on, his own instrument, by a naturally "sympathetic" interpretation of the Sonata of three movements in G, a product of Mr. George Gear's own pen, and a most genial, spontaneous effusion of a really inspired mind. The sonata contains many fine passages, with some effective contrasts. The sequences of the first allegro and certain episodes, would always attract the attention of musicians. The andante cantabile in E flat, dulcet and tuneful, is varied by an agitato in the minor mode; the final rondo, playful, sparkling, and florid, suggests the style of Weber in a well-known scherzo (key of E flat). Mr. George Gear's "fugitive" pieces were Ignace Gibsone's "Saxon Song," Op. 88, and Nicholas Rubinstein's Tarantelle in G minor, Op. 14. Mr. George Gear, apart from his pianoforte, is a pleasing writer of vocal music. Miss Damian, on Tuesday, sang a late effusion "The Old Journal," and Miss Santley gave a very suggestive reading of a positively new song "The Winds," in E flat, with episodes in G major and B flat, the fair vocalist declined to insist, so to speak, on the high (optional) B flat at the end, and was content to make her own pause (without shake) on D, the leading note of the scale. Lady pupils of Mr. Handel Gear sang in the course of this agreeable soirée. Miss Clara Latham afforded much pleasure to the audience in Behrend's "Auntie"; Miss Edith Ruthven made her mark in Mr. W. Coenen's "Lovely Spring," and scored still greater honours in the scena from "Der Freischutz" in E major, where the high B natural was taken without slightest flinching from the "attack." Mr. H. Guy sang Mr. George Gear's air "The White Rose," avoiding the high A natural, and cautiously ending, like a good general, on G (the tonic). In obedience to an encore of Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Last Dream," Miss Damian sang Mr. G. Gear's "Sweet Visions," in E flat, of which Miss Clara Latham is also a capital exponent. Mr. G. Gear's "Hunting Song" (quartet) in B flat, was honoured with an encore d'estime, and might have been repeated, Wilhelmj intends founding a violin school at his villa in Biberich on the Rhine.

Verdi's "Forza del Destino" has been represented at Antwerp, in French, with much success.

Presently a new scheme will be started in Berlin—the performance of classical music at popular prices, under the direction of Herr Carl Blindworth.

The twenty-sixth number of Viotta's "Lexicon der Toonkunst," extending the work to the consideration of the Trumpet-Marine, was lately issued in Amsterdam.

"Le Révérend" is the title of a one-act opera by M. Tandon, recently at Perignan. Bottesini is in Milan superintending the production of his opera "Ero e Leandro."

Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" was lately given in Hamburg for the benefit of Capellmeister Sucher. Frau Rosa Sucher was very successful as Brunnhilde, which part she played for the first time.

It is stated that an adaptation by Mr. H. S. Leigh of Strauss's opera "Prinz Mathusalem," originally produced at Vienna in 1877, will be the piece performed at the re-opening of the Folies Dramatiques Theatre, on May 5th.

Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring" has just been given in Bologna and in Venice. The Italians seem generally to find a want of continuous melody in the music, a fault not easily pardoned in the south; and, notwithstanding the enthusiasm of the more pronounced Wagnerites, it is clear that the public remain cold and generally dissatisfied, to quote a leading Italian journal.

The Société des Beaux Arts of Caën offers to French competitors a gold medal (value 300 francs) for a serenade for violin, violoncello, flute, and pianoforte or harmoniun. Professor Hartzer's design for the Spohr monument at Cassel consists of a life-size statue of the master in bronze, on a granite pedestal. The composer is standing at a music desk, holding his violin under his arm. A monument is to be erected shortly to Konradin Kreutzer at his native place, Messkirch in Baden. Some of this composer's music suffers from undeserved neglect just now.

M. Delibes' "Lakmé" was produced in Paris on April 14th. The scene is in India. The work, upon which an enormous sum has been spent during the process of production, met with distinct success. Several of the marches and dances are charming, and in the composer's best manner. The action of this opera passes in Hindostan. A Brahmin lives with his daughter, Lakmé, in an Indian cottage near a great town. They possess a lovely garden which has a sacred character. One day in his absence this consecrated spot is invaded by an English officer, his son, two daughters, and their governess. Lakmé flutters about among the flowers. Gerald, the young Englishman, sees her, and falls in love with her. The Indian maid reciprocates his passion. As she avows it in a sentimental ditty the Brahmin returns. He finds the paling of his sacred grove broken down, but as the invaders have flown, he swears vengeance, and resolves to go in search of Gerald. In Act 2, disguised as a beggar, we find him at the fête of Dourga in the neighbouring town. Lakmé is with him as a ballad-singer. Her songs attract the young Englishman. When he sees her he rushes towards her, and is stabbed by the irate father. However, his wound is not fatal. Lakmé stays to nurse him. When she can remove him she leads him into a forest to devote herself to him for life. But a Sepoy revolt obliges him to think of quitting his sylvan paradise. The young girl, noting his painful perplexity, smells a poisonous flower, bids him in song a supreme adieu, and gently expires in his arms. The story is not altogether satisfactory, but the charm of the music will secure a good run for the work.

Figaro has it that at a recent meeting of the creditors of Mr. Franke, Herr Pollini, of Hamburg, made an offer to pay £550 in lieu of all liability as to last season's German opera at Drury Lane. The offer was accepted by the creditors present, but, unless all the creditors agree, the proceeding must fall through. It is stated that if the creditors agree they will (owing to the liberality of Mr. Wedgwood, Mr. Franke's father-in-law, who is willing to forego his own heavy debt, and the salaries of the orchestra, which he has purchased, and to pay £1,000 cash) receive a dividend of about ten shillings in the pound,

Mr. W. S. Hoyte was the organist on April 14th. His opening piece was a sonata for organ by the gifted young composer, Mr. Charlton Speer, which was originally published in the Organist's Quarterly Journal. Mr. Hoyte well describes the work in his programme notes, thus :—"The 1st Allegro Maestoso in D flat major is full of vigour. The Adagio in C minor is in happy contrast to the breadth and brilliancy of the 1st movement; an introduction of 16 bars (at the conclusion of the slow movement) leads up to a return of the original key (D flat) for the last movement, which is in the orthodox form. A highly effective treatment of the 2nd subject will be observed towards the end, where the melody is accompanied by arpeggioed harmonies."

This excellent and promising work was very warmly received by an appreciative audience. A serenata by Braga, expressively and artistically played and re-demanded and Wagner's "Pilgrims'" chorus from Tannhäuser, were the next organ solo. Silas' clever Fantasia and Fugue in E minor proved to be excellent, and received loud applause. Mr. Hoyte's musicianly minuet and trio was played. The allegretto from Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony and Handel's "Largo," gave great satisfaction. O. Barris's popular March "The Old Brigade" and the march in Berlioz's "Faust," completed the organ pieces. Miss Annie Williams sang two songs nicely. Mr. Brereton sang "O ruddier than the cherry" and Mattei's "Oh, hear the wild wind" excellently, being encored both times, giving in the last case "The Village Blacksmith." Smart's duet "When the wind" was down for the two singers. Mr. W. G. Wood was the able accompanist.

Mr. Founteen Meen, who is not only esteemed as an accomplished organ player, but generally as a painstaking and conscientious musician, whose abilities as an accompanist are also well known, gave the organ recital on April 21st; his selections were much appreciated, especially Hatton's Toccata in F minor. The programme included pianoforte solos by Mdme. Lucie Palicot (a pupil of Mons. Guilmant), introducing the use of the pedalier. The young lady played Bach's Toccata in F, and Grand Prelude and Fugue in A minor, also a Melodie Hongroise of Liszt, in brilliant style, and won an undeniable encore; after several ineffectual bows she played another solo, to the evident gratification of the audience. The pedalier is really a pedal-piano placed under the other piano, and is introduced by Messrs. Pleyel, Wolff, and Co., the player's seat being placed on the pedalier. This arrangement is no doubt very useful, and in the end may advantageously affect some future school of pianoforte music. Miss Florence Norman, a student of the Royal Academy of Music, was the vocalist, and won a bis in Handel's air "From Mighty Kings," and was recalled after "In questo semplice." Next Saturday the last recital of the present season will be given by Dr. A. L. Peace, the well-known Glasgow organist, whose sterling playing should command the attendance of students and all interested in good organ music.

On the 23rd Haydn's "Creation" was given with orchestra by the choir of the Institute, under the baton of Mr. McNaught. The principal vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Robert Hilton. Mr. Alfred Carder was the organist. The orchestra contained some "good and true men," and taken all together the performance was an excellent one, doing much credit to the conductor, band, choir, and managers.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S PRIZE OVERTURE.

An official announcement has been made to the effect that the umpires of the Philharmonic Society, Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt (the latter kindly acting in the place of Sir Michael Costa), have awarded the prize, offered by the Society for the best overture, to Mr. Oliver A. King, who is now in Canada, and holds the office of pianist to H.R.H. the Marchioness of Lorne, better known as the Princess Louise; the overture was played at the concert of Thursday last. Some published works of Mr. King (seen at Novello and Co.'s) show considerable ability; the earliest of them somewhat crude and strained, but truly promising. A. M.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPOSER.

VI.

TO no class of the world's workers do the words "Know thyself" appeal with deeper significance than they do to the modern composer. As I have endeavoured to point out, success in his case may, without wise care, become a danger only second to prolonged public neglect. The true composer must stand perforce as much by his moral power over himself and manly conscientious judgment of his own work as by his artistic mastery over the multiform difficulties of his profession. I have already dealt with some of the dangers to the artistic character of a composer which arise from a premature success; now it seems needful to remark upon the misapprehensions which are co-existent with a present success which may not be afterwards endorsed by public judgment. The young composer is naturally anxious to leap into fame if possible, and believes that the opportunity for the production of a large work should not only be seized, whatever state of preparedness his mind may be in for the present responsibility of such a composition, but should have all possible friendly extraneous aids in order to compass a success. It would seem, indeed, that the composer must regard friendly help, notwithstanding its value in some directions and the pleasure of its possession, with unflinching wariness, as involving peril as regards the attainment of that just assessment of his work which is indispensable to his ultimate success. In no direction is this danger more pronounced than in the case of the production of a new opera. The young composer must, indeed, possess no small social advantages to succeed in getting his work thought of, and in the end presented. Then it is heard amidst the glamour and excitement attending a stage performance, with all the brilliant, not to say misleading accessories of the arts of the poet, stage-singer, actor, scene-painter, and costumier, before an audience of very decided pleasure-seekers and predisposed to be interested, astonished, and delighted. So it is that almost every contribution to the lyric stage, whatever its merits or demerits may be, has a meed of present success, and the composer his section of determined admirers. But how very few operas live even for twenty years! Time, though the most uncompromising of critics in the end, has the power of alone giving a just and merciful, because true, judgment. To go to a still higher class of music, the oratorio, the composer has again in his favour the presence of friendly enthusiasm. But there are fewer extraneous aids to success in the surroundings of an oratorio performance, and the listeners are necessarily in a more reflective and dispassionate mood than they would be in the feverish atmosphere of the opera house. So the successful rendering of a new oratorio more surely represents the unbiassed judgment of the future than will even a considerable number of enthusiastic, rather than calmly critical, receptions of a new opera. The successful production of a new symphony, as demanding a purely musical judgment and some technical knowledge on the part of the listeners, apart from the excitement, sympathies, and associations accompanying the presentation of vocal works, whether sacred or secular, is perhaps the composer's best testing triumph as an artist; for in this case he appeals more entirely upon the strength of his own imagination, intellect, knowledge and skill than he does in any of the other great types of musical expression and constructive power.

ENGLISH SUCCESSES.

It must be a source of no little gratification to the numerous friends of the Royal Academy, whether pupils or appreciative on-lookers, to reflect that both Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, the composer of "Colomba," and Mr. A. Goring Thomas, the writer of "Esmeralda," were mainly educated within its walls. Their works, which have just been given with such distinct success mark an epoch in our national operatic history; they may prove the beginning of a new, and more independent type than any English operas that have preceded them. Mr. Mackenzie studied harmony and composition under that able teacher the late Mr. C. Lucas; while to Mr. E. Prout, Mr. Thomas is mainly indebted for much valuable training. Both these young composers have probably enlarged their powers by a study and observation of the musical types to be found abroad. But this in no way detracts from the value of their English academical training.

Despite the systematic way in which our valuable institution has been traduced, one cannot but be pleased to see its pupils always to the front, whether as players, singers, or composers. During the life of the last two generations, the Royal Academy has been steadily educating its students in the right and complete way. There is not a town in the land, or, indeed, hardly in the colonies, that is not supplied with one of her alumni, thoroughly competent to instruct the youth, and to guide correctly the taste of the neighbourhood. To the English musical world this is no news; but it is to be lamented that many of the general public, who are ignorant of these facts, are set against the Academy by the voluble talk of those who, knowing well what the institution has done for the art of music in this country, yet for patent purposes deliberately attempt to convey to provincial audiences a totally different impression. At a money collecting meeting held at Chester a couple of months ago, amongst other statements, the Duke of Westminster was pleased to say, that "The Royal "Academy of Music had failed to be a national "institution in the highest sense of the word." His Grace is not generally recognised as an authority on subjects connected with the art, and so he does not come under the type indicated above; though such reckless statements may also do mischief. If he would supplement his dictum with some arguments advanced in support of his assertions, his confident utterances might possibly be received with more respect than they are at present entitled to. A healthy competition between art training institutions cannot but be beneficial. But to endeavour to foist a new venture into superior notice, by systematic misstatements respecting the results achieved by a rival school, savours rather of—what our transatlantic cousins term—"spread-eagleism," than of that judicial impartiality which ought to characterize an hereditary legislator.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

Third Series.

VII.

Although Cherubini does not think it necessary to give new precepts as regards the composition of four-part counterpoint with one voice taking contrapuntal action of either the second or third species, I will venture to offer a few observations upon the employment in a four-part score of the two kinds of counterpoint just named. The student should first practise with the voice, taking either the second or third species counterpoint as either the upper or lower part. This is not only a good way of conquering the difficulties of such contrapuntal action by degrees, by placing the moving parts externally where they are best traced out and most manageable, but it is the practice of such action in the parts most likely to be thus employed in actual composition. Having acquired facility in the external use of counterpoint of either second or third species, it is then desirable to gain experience in the use of such counterpoints placed by turns in both of the middle parts. It is not well to relax the important rules necessary for the government of discordant sounds, but it may be observed that as a dissonance is more completely balanced by three other parts in concordant agreement than it could have been in three parts with two parts only in consonant combination, and further, as discords are, generally speaking, less palpable in their effects in the fuller score of four-parts, the writer may be a little less solicitous about the presence of discordant sounds, either as passing between concordant chord elements or attacked occasionally with the other parts at the beginning of a measure. It is of course important in counterpoint, as it is in harmony, to avoid using with any discord the second below such dissonance. Thus counting from the bass or lower part, the second should not be heard with the first, the fourth with the third, the sixth with the fifth as a rule, or the ninth with the octave. The avoidance of such ill-judged combinations will largely help in giving to the harmony freedom from anticipated resolutions, and a general purity and clearness of tone. In points of difficulty a thinning of the harmony secured by the absorption of one part by placing two voices on the same sound, will often be found to be not only a convenient but a satisfactory way of escape. It is perhaps needless to repeat that dissonances are more objectionable, by reason of the greater length of the notes, in counterpoint of the second than in that of the third species. It may also be said, that the crossing of the parts by the more active counterpoint of the second or third kind is not to be so much protested against as would be part-crossing in four-part counterpoint of the first species, for in the case of the more actively moving part the outline of the contrapuntal melody is clearly traceable. The counterpoints of the second and third kinds should as a rule begin with the customary rest in each case; and should, as being prominent by reason of their distinct activity, take the proper cadence figure if possible, which is peculiar to the species in use at the time.

Digitized by Google

"COLOMBA."

(II. THE MUSIC.)

It has already been shown how faulty is the plot, and absurd the versification of the libretto Dr. F. Hüffer has supplied Mr. Mackenzie with for musical treatment. Remembering what the ancient writer says as to the difficulty of building satisfactorily on a weak foundation, one would suppose that the music of this "lyric drama" could hardly be successful. Happily the reverse is the case; a work of such very decided merit has been the issue, that it may be said without much hesitation, the young Scotch composer has given us the most dramatic, musicianly, and original conception that the English opera stage as yet can boast of. Whether Mr. Mackenzie found much inspiration in the pabulum supplied by Herr Hüffer, or whether the success achieved is to be ascribed to his innate genius, is a point not very difficult to settle. As has been pointed out, the work of the German adaptor is not without certain merits; it is easy to see that the composer has instinctively appreciated the value of the situations the librettist has created, and has done justice, full justice, to the main episodes of the story laid out for illustration. At the same time, there are parts of the opera where his music seems weak, and does not rise up to the very distinct power to be found elsewhere. If the score be examined carefully by the side of the word-book, it will there be seen that these portions are so poor in ideas and clumsy in diction, that it was perhaps impossible for them to convey a spark of inspiration. A hasty generalization, therefore, might assume that the value of the libretto and music was concurrent, but a more careful examination will show that such a supposition is incorrect. There are parts of the libretto wearisome, stilted, and very commonplace; yet here one occasionally finds admirable music, fresh in tone, full of feeling, and bearing in its phrases the unerring stamp of genius. So that if the scales of judgment be held fairly, one must incline to the impression that it is to the freedom of thought and inborn strength of the composer's imagination that we owe the excellences of "Colomba" rather than to the suggestiveness of the libretto furnished. What have been the interrelations between the author and composer I know not, but if a guess may be hazarded from the score, there has been a considerable amount of alteration and revision. Such a course is always a blemish so far as the unity of a work is concerned. In the old Italian operas where music, and music alone, was the attraction, the way in which the various numbers were pieced together was a matter of little moment so that the required contrast of voices and styles was obtained. But the days in which such operas found a ready acceptance are over. The majority of the habitués of the modern Italian opera—at least in London—merely go to be amused, and provided they can hear their "stars" they are satisfied. But not so with the outer musical public; taught by trained thinking critics, the knowledge such opera-goers display is frequently based on the firm ground of naturalness. They are not slow to balance probabilities, perceive incongruities, detect absurdities, and to require an amount of consistence in plot in order to maintain that human interest in a work, without which its days on the stage are numbered. Experience has unerringly taught us that a badly constructed libretto will banish an opera from the stage—Weber's beautiful "Euryanthe" for example. As we turn over the pages of "Colomba" it will be seen that there are sins both of commission and omission; these together with the repulsiveness of its plot, and the impossibility of feeling any sympathy with the revengeful heroine, may militate sorely against its permanent hold on the affections of the public. In any case, blame cannot be laid on the shoulders of Mr. Mackenzie; he has done all that a musician could do, but he has clearly been hampered in his task.

Even in the case of a composer displaying marked originality in all he does, it is not easy to describe in words his style, as we use the term in music. Style consists of so many peculiarities, and is built up of materials so intangible and difficult to grasp, that the task of depicting it is well nigh impossible. Without analysing too minutely Mr. Mackenzie's music, and saying what parts resemble and remind one of the styles of the past great masters, it may be said, that though we find reminiscences of Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Schumann, Verdi, and Wagner, yet the composer of "Colomba" possesses a distinct type of his own, displaying over and over again the precious gift of originality. If a disciple of Wagner should point out that Mr. Mackenzie's form is that of the so-called infinite melos theory of the great Bayreuth master, yet it may be retorted that his melos varies considerably from that of Wagner, which, by the way, is frequently so downright ugly, as not to be fairly entitled to the epithet of melos, i.e., according to the old Greek meaning "sweetness," at all. It is true that Mr. Mackenzie uses his orchestra in much the same way as Wagner has used it, viz., in telling a continuous tale, recalling past occurrences, and suggesting motives, as well as in the more purely formal duties assigned to it of accompanying the voices, and heightening by its timbre the characteristic colour of the situations. All this our young composer has done, but he differs from Wagner mainly in the fact that the partnership between the voices and orchestra is but a limited one, and that strings and wind are rarely allowed to have the best of the co-operation. And further, that though he employs the leitmotive device, he uses it but sparingly, and does not thrust it into prominent notice every few bars, to the dismal discomfiture of the wearied ear, and serious interruption of continuity. It would be folly to assert that Mr. Mackenzie possesses either the marvellous power, or the daring originality in orchestral tone building that all must admit marks Wagner, whatever opinion we may entertain as to the value of his results. But we may maintain that Mr. Mackenzie's method commands respect, and probably conveys more pleasure to the unpledged and unprejudiced mind than the continuous aria parlante style of the German composer, with its cynic indifference to the vital importance of the vocal utterances. Thank Heaven! Mr. Mackenzie has not arrived at the conclusion that infinite melos is quite enough for the various phases of musical illustration. He fully recognises the value of recitative and declamation, as exponents of what happens in daily emotional expression. But better than these mechanical forms, he has the rarer poetical gift of melody, and has turned it to good account in the charming solos, the passionate duets, the bright choruses, the piquant dances, and other detachable pieces to be found in his work. So though, perhaps, Wagner is the master chiefly followed, yet it can be truly said that he has likewise afforded an instance of what to avoid, as well as what to adopt. It will thus be seen that Mr. Mackenzie is no slavish copyist. He has adopted the best suggestions of the great masters of the art, blending some of their ideas, together with his own feelings, into an homogeneous mass, distinctly flavoured with his own originality. One of his features, which perhaps strikes one most, is a mastery over dramaticism, combined with a passionate intensity, which reminds one more of the attributes of warm Southern composers, than of the common characteristics of our colder Northern writers. His conception throughout is on a lofty and extensive scale, and in the part-writing, whether of voices or instruments, we perceive that classical turn of mind that bespeaks long training in counterpoint and sentence construction. The orchestral details are masterly worked out, and if the illustrations he supplies of colouring are nowhere startling, they are at least never harsh, thick, or unpleasantly obstrusive. His scoring, indeed, is beautiful throughout; we can listen to it with pleasure, can admire the many original and ingenious figures with which it is studded, can mark its ebullitions of significant sentiment, without losing interest or grasp over the voice parts.

Such is the general impression that Mr. Mackenzie's music conveys to the mind. The opera has already been so carefully noticed in detail in these pages, that it will suffice if attention is now confined to some of its salient members. It seems a pity that the composer has not written a formal overture to his work; surely after the splendid examples we possess of both old and modern overtures, it cannot be said that this free and elastic form is worked out! He has rather preferred to introduce his opera with a brief prelude written in the alternate times of 9-8 and 3-4. It is a well laid out introduction, containing motives connected with the Barracini, the vocero, the love theme, and the concluding prayer on Colomba's death. In the frequent reiteration of some of these leading themes on the brass, and the obstinacy of the orchestral figures employed, we see Wagner's influence strongly reflected. The opening chorus, "Buy, Signori, buy," is a bright, vivid piece of writing, with a singularly dainty accompaniment, just full of that life and vigour natural to the restless throbbing tide of an Italian market-place. Though Herr Hüffer seems to have mistaken the real nature and office of the Corsican "Vocero"—a song improvised at the grave—and has written some absurd lines in the lyric, yet this is one of Mr. Mackenzie's most striking inspirations, alternately so tender and wild is it. The passionate accents of Colombo, as she tells of her anxious watching and waiting for her brother to return home, and her agitated delivery of the final verse of the Vocero, constitute an episode of intense interest; this and the shout of "vendetta," on the high B, with which the number concludes, is indeed a magnificent example of how, by the subtle power of the musician's art, emotions can be heightened, until one thrills with excitement over the scene acted before us. The following quintet with chorus, "There is death in her words," in which the author occasionally writes in ten real parts (independent of the accompaniments) is a piece of remarkably clever construction, and comes out most effectively. The wild bursts of inflamed passion, and the revengeful feeling which it breathes becoming more intensified in every bar till its close. Here, as elsewhere, it may be remarked, that in the sympathetic music which Mr. Mackenzie has assigned to Colomba, he has not sacrificed grace and coherence, to the storm and fury of dramaturgy. It appears a little odd that there is no special theme or leitmotive connected with the heroine herself. The ballet music is elegant, animated, and somewhat fresh as to rhythm; the Saltarello with which it closes seems to have been suggested by Raff's popular Tarantella. However, this form of music is so circumscribed as to its general character, that but little scope is offered for novelty of treatment, so the resemblance here remarked on may have little significance.

Dr. Hüffer's curious whim in making his English-speaking chorus suddenly burst into Italian has already been noticed. It may now be mentioned, that the music to which Mr. Mackenzie has set the rustic chorus, "Salve Regina del Maggio" is an ancient church melody to be found in the Laudi Spirituali, and is known under the title "Alla Trinita Beata." Its origin might have been indicated in the composer's score. The florid counterpoint in the orchestra which accompanies the massive harmonies of the old tune is an admirable specimen of Mr. Mackenzie's musicianship, and the same remark applies to the fine male voice quartet, in which the Barracini join Orso and the Count in a hollow ode to peace. The way in which the six-part chorus subsequently join in echoing the phrases of the soloists, occasionally doubling their parts in octaves, is really grand. Such a splendid piece of writing could have come from no pen but that of an Englishman, well acquainted with a school of which we have good reason to be proud. The scene which follows this, where Savelli graphically relates the account of the murder of Orso's father by the deceitful Barracini, is throughout a fine example of vigorous workmanship: the librettist has unduly protracted this business, and in the hands of one not gifted as is Mr. Mackenzie, this scene would probably have wearied the audience; but the rough, and yet pathetic manner in which he has let the brigand chief tell the sad tale, the striking changes in tone, where the Barracini deny their guilt, and the revengeful comments of Colomba, unite in presenting the most powerful and dramatic scene yet witnessed on our native stage. Attention may here be called to the singular breadth and sonority of Mr. Mackenzie's finales; a wonderful massive body of tone comes out from his combination of voices and orchestra, so different to the thin noise that is the characteristic of some well-known Italian stage works, in similar tuttis. Musicians will know how to appreciate this valuable feature, and to estimate the hopeful promise it gives of further successes from his pen.

The Corsican love-song in the third act is a rare and beautiful production, possessing some uncommon phrases of melody, and richly decked harmony. But perhaps the gem of the opera is the delicious ballad sung by Chilina, "So he thought of his love." The tender sad flavour that this song possesses, is considerably enhanced by the quaintness of its orchestral support; it is sure to become popular, for its music satisfies the cultured musician, and goes straight to the heart of every hearer. Points to note in this piece are, the happy employment of the augmented second, the breaks in the continuity of the rhythmic metre, the startling effect of the rise from the lower key note (F sharp) to the upper tonic at the close, and the weird warning that lingers on one's ear with the concluding note of the refrain, the voice dying away on the dominant, C sharp.

The ridiculous shooting scene, though it contains some cleverly contrasted music, has not inspired Mr. Mackenzie, but in the finale where the monks conveniently appear, he again shows his power. The Requiem chant of these personages, assisted by the villagers—who are likewise conveniently at the fatal spot—is in thirds and octaves, the orchestra playing an agitated chromatic figure. The scene might well have been more extensively developed, but the advent of that stormy petrel Colomba, now exulting over her satiated revenge, prevents this course; however, her shriek of "vendetta," on the upper B natural, brings the scene to a stirring conclusion. The fourth act is, on the whole, the weakest of the series. Here the inartistic awkwardness of the libretto is apparent. Still, there are two features of special musical interest; the first is the refined and suggestive under-current of music that flows through the orchestra as the two girls, Lydia and Colomba, grope their way amidst the darkness and storm to the robbers' camp. The second point, though we have far too long to wait for it, is a magnificent duet between the lovers "Say of Love, shall he change," a piece full of the warmth and fervour of Italian passion. The music during the flight of the brigands and soldiers is good and stirring, but the conclusion of the opera is too oratorio-like.

If it be stated that Mr. Mackenzie has occasionally written without inspiration, it may in reply be said that in these parts he has had nothing supplied to call up the divine fire; and so one refrains from pointing out in detail certain weaknesses in this opera. But, taken as a whole, his work is the outcome of a masterful, reflective, and original mind; it will command respect from foreign, as it has from critics of his own land. It is evident that in the opinion of the English musical public, "Colomba" can challenge comparison with the contemporary works of any country.

It is not the intention here to describe the performance of the opera at Drury Lane; but it may be said that, thanks to the painstaking care and experience of Mr. Carl Rosa, these were of exceptional excellence. Madame Valleria, by her impassioned singing and powerful acting, has created a Colomba that will not soon be forgotten. She seemed at times to labour under some little difficulty as to the enunciation of the uncouth sentences with which Herr Hüffer had provided her; the rather mixed line:—

"For the coming of thee whom to me of all is dearest," presenting a crux. One could not but feel amused when watching this most truculent full-aged heroine, to remember that the librettist had playfully termed her "a reckless child." Mr. Barton Guckin has risen still higher in public estimation. His fine voice and effective acting contributed in no small degree to the success of the work. But the fool's-cap head-dress with which the librettist had endowed him, made him look like the prize dunce at a school, instead of the hero of a terrible tragedy. The unfortunate Count also commanded sympathy; he was condemned to sing much doggerel, with a huge ornament closely resembling a gorgonzola cheese suspended from his neck. Mr. Novara impersonated the brigand Savelli with signal success. He uses his fine voice with intelligence, and the bluster of his action was capital. The minor parts of Chilina, Lydia, and Guiseppe Barracini, were well sustained; while commendation is justly due to the chorus for their clear spirited singing, and also to the orchestra collectively for the care and delicacy with which Mr. Mackenzie's romantic and elaborate accompaniments were rendered.

Passing Events.

It is now said that Verdi denies the report, that he is writing a new opera on the story of "Othello."

The organ playing of Mr. E. M. Bowman, A.C.O., in different American cities is highly spoken of.

Messrs. Collard and Co., the pianoforte makers, intend to open their West-end saloons for concert purposes.

The name of Her Majesty the Queen will head the list of patrons of the coming Welsh National Eisteddfod to be held in Cardiff early in August.

The re-opening of the Alhambra is announced to take place in October next. A new spectacular fairy opera by Mr. G. R. Sims and Mr. Frederic Clay will be the first novelty at the new house.

Miss Julia Muschamp's "Soirée Musicale," on April 17th, at Fitzroy House, Primrose Hill, presented a good programme. The lady herself played several pianoforte pieces with much skill and consequent success.

Mr. Mackenzie's new opera "Colomba," which has been so successfully produced at Drury Lane Theatre, is to be the first novelty given by Herr Pollini during his coming autumn season at the Stadttheater, Hamburg.

It seems that at the last Royal Society of Musicians' performance of the "Messiah," a loss of £80 was incurred. This affords further evidence that it is high time to examine into our present costly system of concert-giving.

The Bach Choir, under the baton of Herr O. Goldschmidt, go to Windsor on June 23rd. The Queen has specially requested that Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," shall be included in the programme to be performed before Her Majesty.

The Premier addressed, it is said, a cordial letter to Madame Marie Roze, regretting that the pressure of his work would not permit him to hear her sing in "Fidelio," the other evening, and cordially inviting the lady and her husband to breakfast with Mrs. Gladstone and himself.

Mr. A. Sullivan in the course of his speech at the dinner of the Royal Society of Musicians, noted that in 1707 the opera then had an orchestra of 28 players; 12 violins, 2 tenors, 5 basses (which I presume, included a violoncello), 4 hautbois, 4 bassoons, and 1 trumpet, with of course the harpsichord in addition.

There were 46 competitors for the Philharmonic Overture Prize. The proposal was praiseworthy on the part of the society, though only a feeble effort after all. However, competitions notoriously fail in art matters, and the right course for the Philharmonic directors to pursue is to offer commissions to English composers.

The musical world has, by the sudden death of Mr. Reay-Mackay, of the Crystal Palace, sustained the loss of a useful supporter. Mr. Reay-Mackay was only 35. He strongly supported the performance of high-class music at the Palace, and was thinking out a scheme for high-class operatic performances to be given there.

The proposal of Dr. George Grove to hold a bicentenary Handel Festival next year, is leading thoughtful musicians to the idea of a really historic festival free from the prevailing abuses of the master's scores and text. It would be very interesting to hear Handel's music thus rendered as in his own day, with largely doubled oboe and bassoon parts, &c.

The prospectus of the eighth Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace has been issued. The festival will be under the sole management of the Crystal Palace company, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, June 18th, 20th, and 22nd, 1883, a grand full rehearsal taking place as usual on the Friday previous (June 15th). The solo vocalists engaged are Madame Albani and Madame Valleria, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Clara Suter, and Miss Annie Marriott; Madame Patey and Madame Trebelli; Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Joseph Maas; Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Mr. Bridson, and Signor Foli. The chorus and orchestral band will be maintained at the fullest dimensions of previous festivals, numbering about 4,000 performers; and the whole force will, it is earnestly hoped, be under the direction of Sir Michael Costa. The arrangements for both performers and listeners are ample, and carefully considered, so there is every prospect of a successful meeting.

Beethoven's Choral Symphony has been given in Moscow, under Rubinstein's direction.

Madame Hélène Crosmond will arrive in London from Milan for the season early in May.

A festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association at St. Paul's Cathedral is fixed for May 10th.

Dr. Creser lectured to the members of the Leeds Philosophical Society on "The Life and Works of Henry Purcell," with illustrations.

Signor Mazzoni is giving musical re-unions at his residence, 15 Charlotte Street, Bloomsbury. A new "Mass" from his pen was lately given by his pupils and friends, and is reported to be a work of musical value.

Some valuable old and new instruments, and a good collection of sterling music, will be offered for sale at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's, Leicester Square, on Monday next.

It is not often that a musician succeeds in making a fortune out of his profession. Such cases, however, do occur. The will of the late Mr. J. Brockley, well known as a painstaking teacher and writer of some popular songs, has been sworn under £30,000.

Among other new models by the same firm, Messrs. Chappell & Co., have, it is stated, just completed a new oblique grand pianoforte, with dampers in bass. The tone is as powerful as a small grand, and thereby giving greater facility to the player in rendering each note clear and distinct one from the other, and in the execution of staccato, or sostenuto passages.

By permission of Major-Gen. Smyth, commanding the district, the officers at the garrison at Woolwich are to give, on April 27th, at the theatre in that town, a performance of the drama entitled "Time Tries All." This is to be followed on the same evening by the production of a new operetta written by Mr. T. M. Watson, with music by the Cavaliere Zavertal, bandmaster of the Royal Artillery.

In the number of Punch for this week will be found an amusing description of the libretto of "Colomba," together with some clever little woodcuts, illustrative of its queer characters. The German writer is terribly chaffed over his extraordinary production by our witty contemporary, and it is stated that the much criticised Times critic, "Humorous Hueffer," has been already engaged to write the next Gaiety burlesque.

The fourth annual report on the music of the past year at St. Paul's Cathedral has been issued by the esteemed succentor, the Rev. Dr. Sparrow Simpson. During the year 129 different services were sung, and it should be added that more than 495 anthems have been given in two years time. This remarkable record of good work reflects high credit upon the succentor and upon the distinguished organist of St. Paul's, Dr. J. Stainer.

Of the students who went up for examination to the Royal College of Music with the intention of making the violin their principal study, five only succeeded in satisfying the examiners. Among the names of those elected is found that of Master Percy Victor Sharman, of Gipsy Hill, a pupil of Mr. E. Eberwein. About two years ago, the remarkably clever playing of this lad at a concert was noticed in this journal, and a bright future predicted for him.

Mr. C. Vincent, Mus.Bac., for many years the efficient organist of Tavistock parish church, has obtained an appointment at Hampstead, and having been equally fortunate in securing the good opinion of the people of Tavistock, of whom he is now taking his leave, he has recently been the recipient at their hands of a gratifying testimonial. For five years Mr. Vincent has acted as the conductor of the Tavistock Musical Society, the members of which initiated and promoted the movement which resulted in the presentation. The fund was so liberally subscribed to that its promoters were able to purchase a handsome silver-mounted ivory baton, and a silver teapot. The teapot bore the inscription, "Presented, with a baton, to Charles Vincent, Esq., Mus.Bac., Oxon., by the members of the Tavistock Musical Society, of which he was for five years the conductor, Easter, 1883," and the presentation was made by Mr. M. T. Leamon, late president of the Society, accompanied by the heartiest wishes for Mr. Vincent's future success.

REPLIES.

"PRODUCTION OF THE VOICE." E. A. T. will find Behnke's "Mechanism of the Voice," 3rd edition (Curwen and Sons), the most philosophical, lucid, and practical of any work on the subject.—E. ROBINSON.—E. S. writes to the same effect: "The Mechanism of the Human Voice," by Emil Behnke, 3s. (Curwen and Sons, 8, Warwick Lane, E.C.)"; but a new work by the same author is in hand, which I believe will contain photographs of the interior of the larynx, while in the act of singing.

OBOE.—"A Complete Method," by Barret, 16s. (Ladlow and Son, Green Street, Leicester Square). There is also a small one, a number of the "Bandsman," published by Rudall and Co., but Barrett's book is the thing, if "A. Reed" means serious study.—E. S.

Erratum.—An awkward error in the notice of last week may have puzzled many readers. Mr. Walter C. Macfarren's sonata in C minor, for piano and 'cello, should have been said to have been written more suo, or, in his own individual style; but "more suo" was given as the title of the sonata.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

The idea of foreign musicians being preferred by the British public to their own countrymen, is now, happily, an exploded one. Years ago, doubtless, there were many silly people who thought it fine to praise them at the expense of talented Englishmen. This kind of prejudice, was, on the other hand, also frequently manifested against foreigners; even accomplished organists, as well as their bellows-blowers, have been known to treat them with some degree of contempt. Take the following as an example:—Mendelssohn was once playing upon one of our church organs, and after giving out the subject of the Hundredth Psalm, proceeded to extemporize upon it, but in the middle of his grand performance came suddenly to a stop for lack of wind in the bellows. The blower could by no means be induced to resume his exertions, but coolly sitting down protested that he could not be dictated to by any foreigner "whatsomever," and that having been blower there for thirty years, he ought to know how many strokes it took to do the Old Hundredth. Having already given the proper number and two over, no more was on any consideration to be got out of him. Happily we have lived to see Englishmen and foreigners treated pretty much alike. Certainly it is so at the Crystal Palace, both as regards composers and professors generally. During the last few months many works by English composers, including three symphonies, have been produced here, so that no complaint can be made of the compositions of our own countrymen being set on one side.

Of Mr. Wingham's symphony I cannot unfortunately say much at this time, for although through the courtesy of Mr. Manns I can attend the private rehearsals, I was on this occasion unable to do so. I have therefore only heard it once, and without the aid of a score. I am, however, convinced that it is the work of a highly accomplished and very able orchestral composer. In the first movement—which contains many beautiful and spontaneous passages—the influence of Mozart is distinctly felt, and the development of the two principal themes seems almost worthy of that great master. In the adagio the light and graceful manner of Bizet may be traced, but in the finale a more ambitious and less successful attempt is made in the way of effect. I must not forget to mention the scherzo and trio as being perfect models of Mr. Wingham's own happy manner of writing. The performance of the work was very successful, and Mr. Wingham, who was present, was cordially cheered by the audience.

M. De Pachmann was no less appreciated here for his charming performances on the piano than he has lately been at St. James's Hall; and Miss Mary Lemmens, though at first suffering from slight nervousness, was very successful in her well chosen songs. R. S.

Respecting the symphony, Mr. T. L. Southgate writes:—

In Mr. Wingham's new symphony another English success has been scored. In this work the composer has revealed the possession of yet higher powers than he has hitherto been credited with. The favourite pupil of Sterndale Bennett, in the pieces that he has as yet produced, one sees a reflection of the grace and refinement of feeling that is characteristic of our lamented English composer's music. But in this, No. 4 Symphony, Mr. Wingham has apparently taken up new ground, and shown an amount of originality, vigour, and heroic strength, that he has not before exhibited. The main themes employed are, in almost every instance, remarkable for their striking freshness and novelty of form. They are subjects that a widely read and trained musician on hearing would at once exclaim, "Here indeed is something new." But more than mere leading themes, however good they may be, are required to make a satisfactory symphony. There is the treatment and elaboration of the themes, the episodial work, and the orchestration; and, independently of these requisites, a composer must have the gift of flowing thought, and power to knit his materials into a continuous texture, or his work will be but fragmentary, and lack unity in design. Mr. Wingham's symphony certainly possesses these qualifications, besides other features of considerable importance. Noteworthy is the vigour and fire of his episodes, especially those in the first movement, their remarkable treatment setting off to advantage the clear-cut main themes. Both the first and last movements contain an astonishing amount of energy and vigour, the violin parts being brilliantly written, particularly in the upper part of their register. The principal subject of the slow movement is a theme of much intensity and passion, while its second subject (allotted to the 'celli), is a placid, refined thought, in marked contrast with its predecessor. The whole of the andante is delicately conceived and coloured, being more expressive of sweet pastoral grace, than of any special striving after depth of feeling. The minuet is singularly quaint; noteworthy in the trio is the wild rush of the fiddles, as against the quiet passages written for the other instruments. The march-like subject of the finale with its strong diatonic harmonies appears a little heavy for the last movement of a symphony, but the second subject presents a grateful contrast, and the spirited coda brings the work to a brilliant ending. Mr. Wingham's symphony may perhaps sound too bright to ears accustomed to much of the plodding dulness founded on modern German models, but the ingenious construction and ripe scholarship it exhibits, together with its spontaneity, combine to place it in the very front rank of English symphonic works. It is to be hoped that Mr. Manns will soon accord it another hearing.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The programme of the fourth concert given at St. James's Hall, April 25th, was as follows:—

PART I.

Overture ("Hermann und Dorothea")..... Schumann.
Concerto, Pianoforte, in E flat ..... Beethoven.
Madame Sophie Menter.
Vocal Scena (MS.) ("Mary Stuart's Farewell") .. Benedict.
(First time.)
Madame Patey.
The Prize Overture ..... Oliver A. King.

PART II.

Symphony in A (No. 7)..... Beethoven.
Canzonet ("She never told her love")..... Haydn.
Madame Patey.
Prelude in A..... Bach.
Barcarole ..... Schubert.
Solo, Pianoforte ("Wedding March")..... Mendelssohn.
Madame Sophie Menter.
Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 4)..... Liszt.

Schumann's overture, with which the concert opened, is but a dry production, and is certainly not written in his best manner. It was intended as the introduction to an operetta founded on Goethe's poem, the commencement of which represents the departure of the French troops for the war. This accounts for the employment of the Republican hymn, the Marseillaise, fragments of which are interwoven with the music of the overture. Schumann was apparently fond of the theme, for it may be remembered he uses it with admirable effect in his fine song of "The two Grenadiers." The treatment of it in the overture is singularly mild for so warlike a subject; it is almost always given piano. Although the overture contains some ingenious polyphonic writing, the work seems to have been done without much inspiration, and lacks the brightness and warmth of the life scenes it is intended to illustrate. Beethoven's grand Concerto in E flat, the last of the noble five that the master wrote for the piano, and worthily termed the "Emperor," demands for its due rendering an "Empress" of the instrument. And just such an artiste is Madame Sophie Menter. She is confessedly at the head of the fair sex players, and it would be difficult to name a piece better suited for the display of her exceptionally gifted powers. The grandeur of the first movement, the serene tenderness of the second, and the energetic gladness of the rondò found alike a satisfactory exposition in her playing. Her delivery of the opening of the allegro may have seemed a little hard, and she certainly took some liberties with the tempo, so far as the precise time of the respective note-divisions was concerned; but looking to the powerful majestic nature of the opening—as soon as the grand arpeggios are over—it will be seen that firmness and dynamic power are demanded of the player, rather than mere formalness. Sympathetic appreciation was shown to perfection in the noble hymn-like adagio, while the rhythmical phrasing of the brilliant finale afforded an exhibition of rare union of technical skill combined with the perfection of taste. Of the lady's subsequent solos, she gave an excellent rendering of Bach's fine Prelude in A, and of Schubert's delicate little barcarolle; but the choice she made of Liszt's florid fantasia on Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" is to be condemned. It is nothing better than an act of offensive charlatanry to treat this gorgeously coloured orchestral piece from the wondrous "Midsummer Night's Dream" music as a vehicle for pianism. No doubt the fearful difficulties that Abbé Liszt has introduced into his arrangement are calculated to excite astonishment among the Philistines, but the hisses which greeted Madame Menter at the close of the display were significant of the opinion formed by a Philharmonic audience over the achievement. Surely, this great artiste must know that there are hundreds of real pianoforte pieces far more worthy of her powers than was the acrobatic travesty she had selected to play on this occasion.

The symphony chosen for the concert, the No. 7 of Beethoven, is ever welcome and popular, chiefly perhaps on account of the singular contrast that its movements present to one another. The solemn tone of its lovely slow movement, with its heavenly melody in the major, breaking on the ear with singular charm after the close, rich harmony of its mysterious opening, is indeed a revelation of highest genius. The feelings that the last movement induces, with its bright gaiety and powerful rhythmic accents, are of a very different type to those the allegretto calls forth. To the contemplative hearer, the latter may suggest the subject of a placid lake embosomed amidst lofty many hued mountains; the tints of its calm surface changing ever and anon with each passing cloud. But when, through a rift, the glorious sun lights up the scene, a marvellous change takes place. The clear bright colours of the major mode have supplanted sombreness, and the warmth of glowing life has taken the place of cold, though majestic contemplation. The brio of the concluding allegro calls to mind the incessant movement and unrestrained gaiety of some country fair, with its picturesque assembly bent on through enjoyment. Notable in this movement to the musician, is the remarkable descent of the five chromatic intervals of the melody at the end of the second section of the main theme; this passage going down chromatically from F sharp to D natural, instead of conveying (as do most chromatic indulgences) a sense of weakness and effeminacy, really give a feeling of strength and determination, marvellous in its power.

The two novelties the programme contained attracted a considerable amount of attention. The chief was the performance of the overture which gained the prize offered by the Philharmonic Society. The author of the work, selected from among the forty-six sent in for competition by Sir Jules Benedict and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, was Mr. Oliver King. This gentleman was formerly a choir-boy of St. Andrew's Church, Wells Street. He was afterwards a pupil of Mr. J. Barnby, and subsequently studied at the Leipsic Conservatoire; he is now residing at Ottawa, Canada. If truth be meted out with justice, it is impossible to report favourably of Mr. King's essay. The form of his overture is orthodox, the coda however being but indistinctly marked; the themes are trivial, while their treatment and working out is poor, and exhibits neither freshness nor profound scholarship. There is much repetition in the overture; the work is of course correctly written, but its general tone is so monotonous and wanting in contrasts, that its performance excited but little interest. It must be allowed that Mr. King writes with clearness, and his treatment is never harsh or unpleasant; but these qualities, it may be pointed out, do not compensate for a lack of inspiration, and that prime requisite has been denied to him, so far as this new overture is concerned.

The second novelty was a new vocal MS. scena illustrating the monologue delivered by Mary Stuart, translated from Schiller's famous tragedy of that name. The piece is written in a lengthened and ambitious form. It commences with a recitative, occasionally interrupted with brief orchestral sentences; to this succeeds a more formal melody, and this is followed by a short intermezzo leading to a finale. The words roam over so wide a field and are so very varied in sentiment, that the excerpt from the play seems hardly fitted for close musical treatment. This comment, however, applies only to the concert-room; on the stage, the Wagnerian theory might be employed with better chance of success. Sir Jules Benedict's setting is marked by that elegant grace, smoothness, and thorough musicianship that characterizes all he writes; but viewed as a whole, it can hardly be accepted as a faithful reflection of Schiller's singularly touching words. The declamatory phrases are not intense enough, and there was too much of cold uniformity to illustrate the alternate tenderness and passion of the scene. Madame Patey's fine voice was heard to advantage in the piece, the composer conducting it himself; the orchestral accompaniments were very raggedly played. In Haydn's favourite canzonet, the lady had the advantage of Mr. C. E. Stephens's refined accompaniment on the pianoforte. Liszt's remarkable and original Hungarian rhapsody (No. 4), through its performances at the Crystal Palace concerts, has now become pretty well known to Londoners. The band, under their able chief, Mr. Cusins, gave a spirited rendering of the piece, but the tempo at the close was hardly accelerated enough. The wild fury with which the Hungarians themselves play such music electrifies their audience, but this sort of fervid rendering cannot be reproduced by foreigners to the Maygar land.

Cherubini's MS. motet is promised for the next concert.

T. L. SOUTHGATE.

MUSIC IN READING.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

A morning concert, of more than ordinary importance, was given here, in the New Town Hall, on Thursday, April 26th, in aid of the fund for founding a Berkshire Scholarship at the Royal College of Music.

The Berkshire Musical Association, including the Windsor and Eton Amateur Madrigal Society, the Berkshire Amateur Musical Society, and the Wallingford Philharmonic Society, together with amateur members of the Oxford and other musical societies, formed the chorus; and a complete band of forty instruments, principally selected from the Crystal Palace orchestra, and led by Herr Rosenthal, occupied the orchestra. With Mr. Arthur Sullivan, Mr. John Francis Barnett, and Mr. Walter Parratt, as conductors, the material gave promise of a musical performance of unusual interest and effect; and the result was a concert of a kind seldom heard in provincial towns, except at the great festivals.

"The Martyr of Antioch," conducted by Mr. Sullivan, was the principal attraction of the programme, and there is no need to refer in detail to that well-known work, one of the few great examples of English composition. With the advantage of the composer's direction, the many striking points of the instrumentation were well brought out, and the singing of the chorus was most praiseworthy. In the more difficult parts of the great "Chorus of Sun-worshippers," an occasional want of decision and unsteadiness were noticeable with the tenors and basses, who were the weaker part of the chorus; but the sopranos and contraltos sang with remarkable brightness and a careful observance of all marks of expression.

The unaccompanied "Funeral Anthem" was the triumph of the choral singing, and much care had evidently been given to its preparation. In the "Chorus of Heathen Maidens and Christians," the voices were drowned by the orchestra, but this would be rather the fault of the chorus being disproportionately small. The solo vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Barrington Foote. Miss Marriott earned every acknowledgment of her earnest and successful efforts with the difficult and dramatic music of the soprano, and Mr. Harper Kearton sang the tenor music with a purity and refinement which was especially applauded. Miss Cravino also made a good impression, but the voice and style of Mr. Barrington Foote seemed scarcely in sympathy with the bass solo music. Upon the whole the performance was an excellent one, the dramatic force of the music appealing irresistibly to a "morning" audience, fashionable, and therefore inclined to be somewhat cold. But the genius of the composer was recognized by a most hearty recall at the conclusion of the work.

The second part opened with Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Symphonic Poem" for orchestra, with organ and chorus, "The Harvest Festival," also conducted by the composer. Produced at the Norwich Festival in 1881, this cannot yet be called a familiar work, but, notwithstanding the lengthy idyllic poem by Mary Mark Lemon, of which it is a musical illustration, Mr. Barnett has written a charming set of four movements, which would appeal favourably to any audience by their simplicity and melodious gracefulness. The "Dance of Reapers and Gleaners" is quite "dainty" in its melodies and instrumentation. The chorus is only utilized to sing a "Hymn of Thanksgiving" in plain harmonies above the orchestral figure of the concluding movement.

After what had gone before, it seemed hardly fair to produce the "Invocation to Harmony" (by desire, and for the first time in public), composed by H.R.H. the late Prince Consort. Beginning with a chorus, allegro maestoso, in C major, common time, which consists of thirty-one bars of simple chords, an allegretto in three-four time follows, which is really the theme of the work. But it is no more than a simple melody, most simply harmonized, and not remarkable for any originality; the orchestra playing con voci throughout. As this is repeated, allegro and piu allegro, over and over again, it becomes certainly too familiar, especially as the short solos for soprano, tenor, and bass, which are inserted between the choral movements, afford very little relief either in key, melody, or rhythm. Such a work might be very useful to small choral societies of most limited resources, but as everyone knew that H.R.H. the late Prince Consort was an educated musician, one cannot see the use of producing a simple work which does not show any unusual skill or ability, at an important concert such as the one under notice. Mr. Walter Parratt, the organist of St. George's, Windsor, was the conductor of this part of the performance, and I should not omit to mention that he presided at the organ in the preceding items of the programme.

A good rendering of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture by the band, under Mr. J. F. Barnett, concluded the concert. It seemed improbable, with the heavy expenses incurred, that the local Scholarship Fund for the Royal College of Music would derive any advantage from the concert, as the reserved balconies showed many vacant seats, but I believe this the first concert of the Berkshire Musical Association is intended to be, if possible, a sign of the revival of the triennial festivals which were held in Reading with great success thirty or forty years ago. Whether such an enterprise can be supported in these days, with so many altered circumstances, remains to be proved; but the experiment is in the best hands with the new Musical Association; and in wishing it all success, I can only say that the more of such performances we can have here, or in any other provincial towns, the better for musical art and education in every way.

SOUTH LONDON CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

By the earnestness of the members and the painstaking skill of Mr. L. C. Venables, this choir has been raised to a foremost place in the list of London choral bodies. The fifth annual concert of the institution was given on April 26th at St. James's Hall. The programme opened with J. Stafford Smith's noble and too much neglected glee, "Blest pair of Sirens." The programme included such specimens of vocal harmony as H. Smart's "The water nymphs," S. Webbe's "The mighty conqueror," Pearsal's "Light of my soul," Pinsuti's "In April time," Archer's "Kate Dalrymple," Mr. Venable's "Song of the trees," etc. The performance of Eaton Faning's dramatic chorus, "Liberty," was chorally the weakest performance of the evening. Generally the intonation of the choir was excellent, the quality of the voices bright and fresh, and the careful observance of light and shade, together with excellent precision in attack, were alike commendable. The soloists were Miss Clara Samuel, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Barrington Foote. Mr. W. H. Harper was at the pianoforte. Mr. Venables ably conducted. Handel's "Your voices tune," closed an enjoyable performance.

WOLVERHAMPTON CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Monday evening, April 23rd, this society brought a most successful season to a close by a performance of Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist," and Haydn's "Imperial" Mass. The principals on the occasion were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Helen Dalton, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Frederic King, with the band and chorus of 300 performers. Dr. Swinnerton Heap conducted, as usual. The artists were all in excellent voice, and did full justice to the music set down for them. Special mention should be made of Miss Williams's performance of Macfarren's air, "I rejoice in my youth," which was most brilliantly rendered, and fairly brought down the house, in spite of the edict against applause issued by the committee. Mr. Vernon Rigby has never been heard here to better advantage than on this occasion. The choruses were not quite up to their usual standard of excellence, but they made ample atonement for their slight defects by their fine renderings of several items, conspicuous amongst these being the chorus, "Lo, the daughter of Herodias cometh in." Dr. Heap, to whom much of the success of the past season is due, conducted with the taste and judgment which always characterize him. There was a very large audience on the occasion.

The triennial festival in connection with this society takes place in the coming autumn on an enlarged scale, and promises to be a highly successful one.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The music chosen for the concert of the 27th of April at St. James's Hall gave at once works of distinct interest and pleasant familiarity in Schubert's Mass in E flat, and Mendelssohn's ever fresh "Hymn of Praise." Schubert's noble Mass is one of his most characteristic and beautiful sacred works. It abundantly displays his perfect gift of tune, his earnestness and dramatic feeling, as it also shows his tendency to diffuseness, even to weakness, and want of systematic contrapuntal training. All the same, it is a glorious piece of Church music. The lovely and tender "Et incarnatus est" and the vocal "Benedictus" are after the composer's best manner. The fine "Kyrie eleison," the broad solemn "Agnus Dei," and the beautiful "Dona nobis pacem" are all notable movements of their kind. The instrumentation of the work, again, is of a most interesting character. Not only does it present many delicate and charming effects, but it displays many points in the use of the trombones, &c., which at the time of its composition (1828) were enlargements of treatment although not newly invented effects. The work, on the whole, was admirably presented; although, with regard to the band, the strings were somewhat too weak and the brass at times too ostentatious. The many charming effects for the wood, wind, and combined instruments were well pronounced, and showed care. The soloists of the evening were Miss Annie Marriott, Mrs. Suter, Miss Hancock, Mr. H. Kearton, and Mr. R. Hilton. Mr. Charles Hallé conducted. The symphony of the "Hymn of Praise" received, on the whole, a good and careful rendering, though the brass department was again too assertive. To the chorus this work was clearly a familiar and welcome friend, and the choral movements were excellently taken. The "Messiah" will be given on May 11th.

THE BACH CHOIR.

At the third and last concert of the season, given on the afternoon of April 28th at St. James's Hall, Bach's great Mass in B minor, was performed. This gigantic work was written by the great cantor of Leipzig when he had reached the ripest and most prosperous part of his career, after accepting office as chapel-master to the court at Dresden in 1736. The present performance was only the seventh in London. Though admiring the spirit and judgment of the Bach Choir in presenting this noble work from time to time, one must regret that it is deemed necessary to curtail portions of two or three of the soli movements. It is quite true that modern taste demands a more dramatic, terse type of solo, duo, etc.; all the same, the performances of the Bach Choir are of the dignity of being historical performances, and as such demand the utmost completeness and the strictest integrity with regard to the composer's text. The opening chorus was well rendered, and the beautiful fugal chorus, "Kyrie eleison," was given with an evident feeling for the expressive contrapuntal idioms of the movement. The whole of the "Gloria," with its varied and complex movements, was finely rendered. The obbligato passages for flute, oboe, and horn (this last most trying from the extended compass and technically difficult figures employed), were most artistically rendered by Mr. Radcliffe, M. Lebon, and Mr. Mann. Equally excellent was the general rendering of the colossal setting of the "Credo," the solos of which were sung by the ladies previously mentioned and by Mr. Brereton. The effect of the closing chorus was indeed superb. The Sanctus was admirably given. The presence of two such experienced artists as Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. Carrodus, as singer and violinist in the graceful setting of the "Benedictus," secured a rendering of much eloquence, tempered with sound judgment. The "Agnus Dei," contralto solo, and "Dona nobis pacem," final chorus, were both well performed. The B minor Mass reveals to the listener a mine of pure melody and contrapuntal power. It was the first of the great modern settings of the office; in grandeur of design it is alone equalled by Beethoven's Mass in D. As regards length (which alone would make its use as Service music impossible), it is one of the longest settings of the Mass in existence, the longest being probably Bach's Mass in B minor, Beethoven's in D, Schubert's in E flat, Mozart's so-called No. 12, and Cherubini's Mass in D minor. It is, in the interest of the art, to be hoped that the Bach Choir will from time to time present this great Mass, which is one of the highest exemplifications of the genius of Bach; who, Catholic-minded in the largest sense of the word, as men of genius usually are, notwithstanding the cramping effects of local surroundings, wrote for the Roman and Lutheran branches of the universal Church with equal earnestness and power. The organ on the 28th was in the capable hands of Mr. T. Pettit, and Herr Otto Goldschmidt occupied his usual place as conductor. That the Bach Choir will again come forward with their useful and artistic efforts next season with undiminished earnestness will be the hope of all lovers of the art.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.—On May 1st Gade's "Psyche," a portion of Bennett's "May Queen," and Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, etc., formed the attractive programme of a concert given in St. James's Hall. The music for the most part received a careful and artistic rendition. The Princess of Wales honoured the performance by her presence.

SOUTH NORWOOD.—A sacred concert was given in the Wesleyan Church, 26th of April. The singers were, Miss Evelyn Bawtree, Mdme. Jennie Bawtree, Mr. E. Putman, and Mr. A. W. Owen. Mr. H. T. Pringuer played the following organ solos:—Overture in C (Mendelssohn); Andante in A flat (W. S. Hoyte); Fugue in G (Krebs); Barcarolle (W. S. Bennett), and Organ Concerto, No. 2 in B flat (Handel).

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The short season at Covent Garden of the now limited liability company commenced on May Day. The theatre has been provided with numerous doors in order to facilitate a more comfortable ingress and a quicker egress. Precautions of an elaborate kind have also been made against dangers from fire. The opening opera was Verdi's "Aïda." Mdme. Fursch-Mardi and Mdlle. Stahl, with Signori Cotogni and Scolara, efficiently undertook the leading parts. Signor Bevignani conducted the large and excellent orchestra. The other operas of the week were "Marta" and "L'Africaine."

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.—The second concert of the 17th season was given at St. James's Hall, on April 19th. Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 47, a just now neglected composition, by the way, opened the concert, being well rendered by Messrs. Carl Hause, Henkel, Witt, and Schuberth. Mdme. Zimeri contributed several songs, singing with much artistic power. Miss Eva Thompson played Schumann's "Arabesque" and Handel's Fugue in E minor. Several young artists made their first appearance upon this occasion; but they were too nervous to do themselves justice. Herren Henkel and Schuberth played in good style solos for violin and violoncello.

CLAPHAM POPULAR CONCERTS.—A most successful series of entertainments, which have been given weekly for the last five months, was brought to a conclusion on Saturday. The directors (Mdme. Louisa Vernon and Mr. Douglas Vernon) were on this occasion assisted by Miss Edith Luke, Miss Laura Clare, Mr. George Batchelor, Mr. Charles Weller, Mr. Henry Canter, Miss Alice Bertram (piano), and the Semper Paratus Quartet (mixed voices). All acquitted themselves in a very excellent manner. The services rendered by those engaged throughout the series were acknowledged by the clergy of Holy Trinity, and the treasurer to the fund; and Mr. Vernon, in reply, expressed the great pleasure it had been to provide from week to week for the enjoyment of an audience so appreciative.

DOUGLAS, ISLE OF MAN.—Mr. Walter Lucas, organist of St. Thomas's Church, gave an excellent concert on April 17th. His pianoforte solos were a selection of four of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" (Nos 1, 23, 18, and 34), and Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique." Mr. Lucas proved himself to be a performer of power and judgment. His execution and touch were indeed admirable; and the audience greeted him with much applause. The vocalists were Miss Fanny Bristowe, Miss Howard Dutton, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. John Barrow. The vocal music was a miscellaneous assortment of good and popular pieces, mostly English.

RICHMOND.—The Kew Road Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Haydn's "Creation" on Thursday evening, April 26th. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Mr. J. Williams, and Mr. W. Forrington; organist, Mr. J. F. Goodban, R.A.M.; conductor, Mr. F. A. Crew. For her rendering of the airs "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," Madame West received an outburst of applause; a scarcely less marked compliment being paid to the other soloists for some of their numbers. The choruses were nearly all admirably rendered under the able conductorship of Mr. Crew, and Mr. Goodban accompanied with taste and judgment.

PRINCES' HALL.—The new art galleries, which include the handsome concert-room to be known by the title given above, were opened on April 27th, in the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh and other members of the Royal Family. The acoustical properties of the concert-room are admirable, and are as satisfactory as are the elegant decorations of this luxurious abode of the arts. A vocal and instrumental concert commenced with a verse of the National Anthem and a glee was given by the Vocal Union Choir, under the direction of Mr. Fred. Walker. Miss Santley, Signor Piatti, Mdme. Patey, M. V. de Pachmann, and Signor Foli also assisted during the evening; Mr. Fred. Cowen presiding at the pianoforte, during the proceedings. The royal party was conducted through the three galleries, and displayed much interest in the 900 pictures exhibited. The new room is another fact contributing to the growing evidence of the co-operation and mutual assistance characterising the advancement and relationship of the sister arts in these days of earnest artistic progress.

ROYAL VICTORIA COFFEE HALL.—The ballad concert given on Thursday, April 26th, at the above Hall, was one of the most successful of the season. M. Sainton conducted with great vigour and affability, and the choir of ladies (pupils of M. Sainton), sang with remarkable artistic power and precision. The ballad concerts for May at the above Hall will be under the direction of Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Clement Hoey, Signor D'Havet Zaccara, and Mr. J. Greenhill. This gentleman is arranging a concert to illustrate the vocal music of Shakespeare, arranged in chronological order, with biographical sketches and anecdotes of the various composers. On 22nd Mr. W. Carter's choir of 300 voices will give a performance of "Placida," under Royal and distinguished patronage. In consequence of the large audiences that have attended on the Wednesday and Friday Penny Nights' Entertainments, Tuesday will be added to the third night in the week, and from the 12th inst. the prices on Saturday, Monday, and Thursday nights are to be lowered for the summer season.

GLASGOW.—A performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given on April 25th, by the South-side Choral Society. The soloists were all local, and among them were two members of the Glasgow Select Choir. Mrs. Smith, Miss Fyfe, Mr. Howell, and Mr. James Fleming, were the principals, and Mr. James McKean the conductor. Mr. W. Davidson was the organist, and the orchestra was made up of resident performers. The performance was in many respects highly creditable, and much praise is due to the chorus for the firm and vigorous style in which many of the numbers were rendered. An occasional roughness and tardiness in the attack were the only noticeable drawbacks. The principals were all successful; but Miss Fyfe showed to much less advantage than was to be expected from the beautiful quality of her voice. Her inexperience of oratorio music in a measure qualifies her shortcomings. The orchestra played remarkably well, and the organist was equally good. The Glasgow Select Choir has been invited to repeat the Hymn Music programme, previously noticed, at several of the larger Scottish towns, and will no doubt aid in effecting the much needed reformation in Scottish psalmody. Professor Bruce is delivering lectures with the same laudable object in view. There is a scheme afloat here to establish a branch college in connection with the London Tonic Sol-fa body, and a meeting in furtherance of the same has already been held.

ECCLES, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening the members of the Eccles District Vocal Union had their first open meeting at the Eccles Town Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Gaul's cantata, "The Holy City," which was rendered with great precision and effect. The choruses, "They that sow in tears," and "Great and marvellous," were much appreciated. The solos were taken by the following members of the union: Miss A. Rawson, of the Royal Academy of Music, Miss Hibbert (pupil of the musical director, Mr. R. F. Coules, F.C.O.), Mr. G. S. Ball, Mr. T. Hibbert (pupil of Mr.

Coules), and Rev. C. Heath, M.A. Miss Rawson sang "Eye hath not seen" with admirable taste, as did also Mr. Hibbert the solo "Thus saith the Lord of hosts," the chorus singing the Sanctus pianissimo. The cantata was evidently much enjoyed by the audience, as was shown by the hearty applause at the conclusion of the work. The second part of the programme opened with a part-song, "Wake, to the hunting," by Smart, and "The lullaby of life" (Leslie), followed by a pianoforte solo by Mr. R. F. Coules: (a) March Funebre from Sonata in B flat minor, Chopin (b) "Jagdlied" (Schumann), both of which were well received. Miss A. Rawson sang "Orpheus with his lute" (Sullivan), and Mr. T. Hibbert sang "The roll call" (Pinsuti), for which he was recalled, and sang "The warrior bold." The Rev. C. Heath, Mr. G. S. Ball, and Mr. Watson contributed songs in a praiseworthy manner. The concert concluded with the exquisite glee "When wearied wretches" (Bishop). The hall was filled. The Rev. F. Coules, F.C.O., conducted the choruses, accompanied the songs, and played the above pianoforte solos.

TOTTENHAM.—On Tuesday evening, April 24th, the Tottenham Wesleyan Musical Society gave a most successful concert to a crowded audience. The first part was of a miscellaneous character, consisting chiefly of sacred songs and choruses from well-known oratorios. Mr. James Budd rendered Handel's two fine solos, "Arm, arm, ye brave" and "Honour and arms," in his usual artistic manner, while Miss Coyte Turner sang with great taste the lovely air from Costa's "Naaman," "I dreamt I was in heaven." Mr. Edward Dalzell sang "In native worth," but his lack of expression must have been keenly felt by all those who were able to appreciate the beauty in good old father Haydn's music. Certainly the most unsatisfactory thing in the first part was the attempt on the part of Mr. Kessell to sing "If with all your hearts"; there are certain mistakes which very often summon up a smile from the most stern musician, but anything short of contempt could not have existed in the hearts of those who boasted of the largest amount of charitableness. We must not forget to mention with great commendation the admirable violin playing of Mr. Arthur Payne, a young man in possession of indubitable talent. The second part of the concert opened with Suppé's overture to the "Poet and the Peasant," well rendered by the band; but the prominent feature was Macfarren's "May Day." Without any undue praise, we may say that a finer rendering of this work has never been achieved by an amateur choir, though do not let it be imagined from the prefix that it should take a secondary position in the rôle of choirs. Too much praise cannot be accorded to Mr. R. J. Pitt for the great attention he has given to the choir during the past season, and the high state of proficiency his musical talents has been able to bring it to. Miss Rissel took the part of the May Queen; Mr. Jefferys was organist, and Mr. Geo. F. Grover presided at the piano.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, May 1st, 1883.

It is always a good thing to allow one's self a little time for reflection before expressing a decided opinion about so important an effort as a new opera. First night audiences and their impressions are often critical, but, as a general rule, they are not trustworthy. We know from repeated experience that a second and third nights public often reverses the verdict of the critics and "society," and the time has gone by, at least in Paris, in which it was possible to force people, by ingenious puffery or depreciation, into swallowing the ready-made views of the small body which is supposed to set the fashion in music, and which too frequently records its views, favourable or unfavourable, under the influence of prejudices, tastes, personal likings, dislikings, or hatreds, unshared by the greater, vulgarer public which comes after, and comes to the new thing set before it with an honest determination to enjoy it if that be possible, and if that be impossible, to make the fact as clear as silence, or sibillation, can.

Having relieved myself of these generalities, perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words about the new Anglo-Indian opera of M. Léo Delibes, "Lakmé," although you have already devoted some of your space to its discussion last week. "Lakmé" is, musically speaking, in many respects a disappointing work, and has certainly been overpraised by the critics. The two first acts, though pleasing enough, I admit, are dreadfully wanting in depth and originality; while the third, charming as it is, undoubtedly, would certainly be far less interesting were it not for the charming poetry of the libretto which has inspired it, and with which it shares the applause. I, for one, ungrudgingly gave, and am ready again to give it, when I hear it. Briefly: "Lakmé" without this third act would be a decided failure. The success of the third act is due in a great measure to Messrs. Gille, Gordinet, and Mortier, the librettists. Wherever M. Léo Delibes has succeeded, it is because he has managed to thoroughly identify himself with the touching and tender scenes imagined of this triumvirate of librettists. Wherever he has failed, or seems weak, he may ascribe the fact to his having ceased to be in harmony with his subject. The libretto, in fact (you were rather disdainful in speaking of it last week, I noticed) is the making of this opera, and the best thing in it. As to the music—if you press me for an opinion, I will confess it is poetic and pretty. But if you press me just a little more, I will have to own that it is no less shallow. The orchestration, from beginning to end, is ingenious and agreeable. The melody is facile, too, save here and there, where the composer has been carried away by his orientalism and dreamy sentiment. But there are shocking faults of taste and judgment in several of the morceaux, especially in the second Act, which contains a "Legende" (written "expressly to suit" the gifted little Lakmé, Mdlle. Marie Vanzandt), so thoroughly out of keeping with all that goes before and comes after it, that it is impossible to avoid getting rather angry and disgusted with M. Léo Delibes. He might be doing better than humoring the caprice and peculiarities of even so delightful a little tyrant as Mdlle. Marie Vanzandt. And talking of this, I should very much like to know why Lakmé deliberately departs from the dramatic proprieties at this particular point, to sing at the audience instead of to the mottley group of Hindoos and English who have assembled on the stage to listen to her trashy "Legende."

Despite these criticisms, and despite, or perhaps I should be more correct in saying because, of its very facility and lightness, "Lakmé," seems to be a remarkable success. It is studded with musical pearls which will certainly be most popular in all drawing-rooms, and it is one of the most pleasing works that any lazy amateur of the divine art could wish to hear. Now most opera-goers in all countries—Italy, perhaps, excepted—are lazy.

It will be interesting in the extreme to compare "Lakmé" with Felicien David's "Perle du Brésil," which is really to be revived this week for the début of Miss Emma Nevada (née Wixom) of Nevada city, the prima donna who is to succeed Marie Vanzandt at the Opera Comique. Most good judges of Felicien David set far greater store on this opera than on "Lalla Rookh," by which he is better known to the present generation. Nous verrons.

M. Pasdeloup deserves great credit for having at last bravely broken free from routine, and determined to give us a chance of hearing good orchestral concert music in May, as well as April, March, or February. He has arranged for a series of afternoon concerts this month at the Eden Theatre, and as there is not one music-lover less in Paris than there was a month ago, while the number of entertainments for the aforesaid music-lovers has been very largely reduced, there appears to be no reason whatever for his not drawing crowded houses and doing well. Apropos of all this, the subscription for the shares of the Concert Populaire Company makes headway but slowly, a matter which on every account is to be regretted.

M. Guilmant has given the first of his interesting organ recitals at the Trocadéro, with the assistance of M. Colonne's orchestra and several distinguished artists. The concert was well attended. C. H. MELTZER.

Reviews.

Messrs. Duncan Davison, of Regent Street, publish three compositions by Mr. Georg Asch. Hide and Seek is the title of a song in F, with limited compass, which the public have heard through the medium of such interpreters as Mdlle. José Sherrington and others. Miss Meysell sang it at her late concert. Two easy pianoforte pieces from the pen of Asch are the Danse des Savoyards, a sort of polka movement, in F, and Feuilles Mortes, a reverie in B flat, of very simple style, but smooth and flowing. He also gives to the public, through Messrs. Willey & Co., two new Gavottes, both pretty and suited to amateur players. They are entitled Vive la Reine in F, and Sonata Sophia, of oriental colour, in E flat.

A Lullaby. By W. W. Hedgcock. (Augener & Co.)—A melodious setting of Barry Cornwall's well-known lines. The song presents variety as to its mode of treatment, and the accompaniment is well laid out, displaying in places freshness and originality.

The Lord is with thee, Anthem. By G. A. Osborne. (Novello & Co.)—This is a thoughtfully written anthem, in which flowing melody plays an important part. Far too many of our modern pieces of this form depend for their effect chiefly on highly coloured and elaborate organ parts. While fully recognising the use and importance of the accompanimental settings, the mission of which is but to enshrine and assist in displaying the vocal parts, Mr. Osborne has also been mindful to give us good pure melody and smooth part-writing. The full choral portions of the work are well contrasted and relieved by solos for tenor, bass, and soprano. The anthem is decidedly effective, and seems likely to become a favourite.

Chant du Pêcher, Pour Piano per Francesco. Berger. (Lamborn Cock.)—A well constructed and melodious song without words, in which the interest is equally divided between both hands.

Minuet and Trio, for the pianoforte. By C. H. Couldery. —Vittoria, air. By Carissimi. Arranged for the pianoforte. (Lamborn Cock.)—The first-named piece revives an old form which has furnished many clever and pleasing specimens of the art. The above can, however, hardly be classed under either one or the other of these heads. The air of Carissimi does not lend itself readily to the modern pianoforte treatment, and is not improved by its new dressing.

Sonata (in G), for the pianoforte. By Domenico Scarlatti. Marked and fingered by Florence May. (Lamborn Cock.)—This is a specimen of the sonata form in its earliest days, and, after the manner of D. Scarlatti, consists of but a single movement. The treatment of the subject is in the simplest style of imitation in two parts, and will be found an excellent study for the young student. The editing is judiciously carried out.

Gavotte and Courante. By J. S. Bach. (The Fan Series.) (Lamborn Cock.)—Under the fanciful title of the "Fan Series" a good selection of ancient and modern authors is in preparation—Handel, Rubinstein, Dussek and the above two movements from the French suite in G being already published. This last appears to be carefully fingered and is particularly clear as to print.

Transactions of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, 1882. (Longmans & Co.)—A valuable volume, containing full reports of the proceedings last year in Nottingham. The papers and discussions on art matters include Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Lecture "On the Royal College of Music," given at length in these columns. The matter bearing upon Education, Art, and various subjects of social and artistic importance, contained in this volume, forms indeed a mine of thought well deserving the attention of intelligent readers.

Higher Examination of Papers of Trinity College, London, 1874-82. (W. Reeves, Fleet Street; and A. Hammond & Co., Vigo Street.)—To musical students, this collection of examination papers, as set by some twenty-nine of the leading men of our day, will be most acceptable, as containing a very mine of musical thoughts and technical suggestions. To the musical world generally, the book offers undeniable evidence of the general excellence, earnestness, and thoroughness of the examination work undertaken by the spirited institution in Mandeville Place.

Agnes of the Sea. By Louis Liebe. (Stanley, Lucas, Weber & Co.)—This cantata presents a peculiarity which, under certain conditions, will be readily appreciated. Its characters are two, viz., soprano and contralto, while the chorus is written in two parts only, instead of three, as is customary in works of this character. Short cantatas for ladies' voices are now much affected at the breaking-up concerts (as they are termed) of schools. Those who have conducted such works can bear testimony to the considerable difficulty experienced in getting a satisfactory representation of the third voice part. Two parts pretty well exhaust the voices at disposal, unless the school, or vocal class, is a large one, and the contralto element strong. For this reason, Mr. Liebe's cantata will be welcome. The story is founded on a Norsk legend of a maiden lured by the songs of the sirens to dwell in the depths of the sea. But the fickle fair one hears the church bells of her native village, and quitting the mermaids, returns to her home again. Miss Johnstone has told the poetical story in good English, and it may in some quarters be deemed an advantage that the usual love element is absent from the tale. Mr. Liebe's music is satisfactory, though it presents no features of striking novelty. A ballad, "A maiden sat by the shining strand," is good; and towards the end of the work happy use is made of the melody of "Home, sweet home." Most of the choruses and airs are simply constructed, the only ambitious piece in the work being a somewhat independently written duet, "Farewell." The composer is a little fond of enharmonic changes, and a considerable amount of the cantata is written in 6-8 time; but this conventional barcarole form seems to be inseparable from sea music. The accompaniment is for the piano alone. Would it not be well for the writers of pieces of this kind to employ an harmonium in conjunction with the eternal pianoforte? By this means an agreeable colour of tone can be got, which would certainly heighten the effect of the music written. The value afforded by the contrast and mixture of these two household instruments may be commended to the notice of writers of works of this character.

True Love to Win. By G. Benson, Mus.Bac., Cantab. (Lamborn Cock.)—We have here a smoothly written glee for four male voices. Mr. Benson's work shows that though this form of composition seems, from various causes, to be dying out among us, we still possess composers who can write melodious, richly harmonized music in this peculiarly English form.

The Mermaids' Invitation. By Ridley Prentice. (Lamborn Cock.)—An admirable trio for ladies' voices. There is so much excellent musicianly work in this, that if nicely sung it is bound to satisfy hearers of every type Elementary Exercises on the Rudiments of Music. By E. Ellice Jewell. (Lamborn Cock.)—"The Catechism on the Rudiments of Music," of which these exercises now form a continuing portion, has already been noticed with approval in this journal. The exercises are well designed for impressing on pupils the cardinal features of the art they are studying. The quicker these essentials are appreciated and fixed on the memory, the more rapid will the progress of the student become. The book consists mainly of ruled music staves for the pupil to write the various exercises directed to be worked out. The plan is a good one; the directions printed before each exercise are so lucid, and the work so cheap, that Miss Jewell's exercise-book ought to be gone through by every pupil who is studying intelligently.

Epitaph on a Robin. By C. A. Ranken. (Lamborn Cock.)—A simple little song, aptly illustrating Samuel Roger's pathetic words. To those who can command an obbligato violin accompaniment, the ballad will prove welcome.

The Hidden Land. By Livesey Carrott. (Lamborn Cock.)—A song, the words of which are of the semi-mysterious type much in vogue at the present day. However, the idea conveyed is poetical, and Mr. Carrott's music has a healthy freshness about it that ought to render the song popular.

Harmony. By Carl Mangold. (W. Morley & Co.)—The composer of this little work is professor at the Guildhall School of Music, and is favourably known as an able, conscientious teacher, long settled in this country. The treatise, though small, is singularly complete, and appears to be the outcome of a life's study of the best writers on harmony and counterpoint, educed by a lengthened experience of tuition. The explanations given on the various branches of the science are so clear and distinct, though brief, that nothing a student ought to know is omitted. The illustrations printed, are admirably chosen to fix the rules touched on firmly in the mind. An appendix gives a mass of valuable information in question and answer form. The treatise, lucid and complete in itself, may be recommended as a useful introduction to the more elaborate works on the subject by Fux, Albrechtsberger, Cherubini, and G. Weber.

Mr. Sims Reeves gave a concert on May 1st, at St. James's Hall. He had the assistance of some of our leading singers and the "Anemoic Union."

A COMPLAINT ANENT INCOMPETENT CONDUCTORS.

Only those who are habitually playing on orchestras, operatic or otherwise, can have the least idea of the amazing difference there is in that art called "Conducting"; and though old stagers like the writer are perfectly well aware that a great conductor "is born, not made," yet, strange to say, the greater the number of great qualities required to make a great conductor, the more numerous are the aspirants who pant and yearn to wield the bâton. Almost every organist or musician of a leading social position, whatever may be his powers or experience, assumes that he can conduct the "Messiah" or "Elijah," or some such work. Every aspiring non-professional, especially of the vocal order, seizes the earliest opportunity of conducting part-songs, small cantatas, etc. Only those who have played under really competent conductors can perhaps see and feel acutely the shortcomings of vain, inefficient leaders. Conductors of the last-named type, as a rule, know little or nothing about the band parts and the complex effects of high-class orchestration; two out of three sing, while conducting, the chorus part of their own particular vocal compass, and, as a rule, are serenely unconscious of the shortcomings or reliability of the strings, wood, or brass. I could unfold some stories of incompetent conductors had space permitted such narrations. Surely it is high time musicians studied the art of conducting systematically, especially now the growth of orchestral music is so rapidly advancing from day to day.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

On Tuesday last, Mr. H. J. Stark, Mus.Bac, &c., delivered a very useful and excellent lecture on the subject of "Counterpoint" at the Neumeyer Hall. The living interest taken in this great subject was evidenced by the large assembly of members and friends present. The course adopted by the lecturer was to plead for a moderate reformation of the contrapuntal laws in certain directions. This position he strengthened not only by presenting examples (lithographed copies of which were liberally supplied to the audience), but by a thoughtful and clever exposure of the discrepancies and evasions so constantly to be noticed in the too free examples all the contrapuntal theorists illustrate their rules with, to the dire confusion of thoughtful students, who not unnaturally expect men to practise what they preach. This is perhaps not the place to point out, that though great value must be attached to the fact that gifted, shrewd men like Mr. Stark are disposed to lead the way towards the imparting of what may be taken as broader, freer principles in counterpoint, the contrapuntal art, as Dr. F. E. Gladstone, the learned and able chairman, pointed out with much force and perspicuity, must largely be regarded as a means to an end, that end being composition. Further, there is a danger in telling students of the supposed advantages of contrapuntal freedom, which is parallel with the policy of letting boys advance to manhood free from the restraints absolutely necessary to form upright men and to prepare them for the enjoyment of a righteous freedom. Grammatical strength is essential in all art, and so felt some of the eminent musicians present, although they cordially hailed Mr. Stark's courageous and masterly advocacy of an enlarged contrapuntal policy with much satisfaction. The speakers, during the very useful discussion following the lecture, were Dr. Gladstone, Mr. Higgs, Mus.Bac., Mr. G. A. Osborne, Mr. A. C. Cooper, Mr. Bradbury Turner, Mus.Bac., Mr. James Turpin, Mus.Bac., and Mr. F. Davison (Messrs. Gray and Davison). Summed up and fairly balanced, the opinions of the lecturer and various speakers really accorded in the desire for a thoughtful, careful, widely based, and generous study of the great art, which in the main, to quote the thoughtful opinion of Mr. James Higgs, elsewhere expressed, is the department of the art most beyond the reach of change and fashion. The lectures remaining are "Some Musical Ethics and Analogues," Mr. H. C. Banister, on June 5th; and "The Organ Writers of the Nineteenth Century," Mr. F. J. Sawyer, Mus.Bac., July 3rd. The very interesting meeting terminated with the usual and well-deserved vote of thanks.

PROFESSIONALS AND NON-PROFESSIONALS.

AGAIN the vexed question of the distinction between the "Regulars" and "Volunteers" of the art intrudes itself; this time the matter is urged to the front by the letter of an esteemed correspondent and occasional contributor, which will be found elsewhere. Until the points in dispute are fully and amicably settled, it may be presumed that the delicate questions involved will arise from time to time. It is less my present purpose to endeavour to frame a reply to "H. E. S.," than it is to try to show how difficult any settlement of the questions at issue must be, and how tenderly and courteously such questions must be considered, as concerning the relationship between two indispensable and mutually essential bodies of the artistic world. To begin, there is a danger of setting up some needless irritation in the Quixotic idea that a strongly marked line of demarcation between our professionals and amateurs is essential to the well-being of the art and necessary for the due recognition of the interests of its followers. The truth is, the setting forth of a distinct line of demarcation between the two great artistic divisions is an impossibility; and the two bodies are, through the growth of a general culture, chiefly advanced by our excellent professional teachers themselves becoming more and more intimately connected and interlaced from day to day. The history of all the arts will show the same processes of artistic life. First, in its rudimentary forms a given art is practised without systems and without full appreciation and consequent rewards; then an acknowledged profession of its principles and practice does not practically exist. In process of time the development of such art is sufficiently advanced to require the ministrations of artists pledged to a life-time of earnest and highly skilled service, whose rewards grow with the advancing appreciation of their labours. As appreciation gains ground, the professors of the art are inevitably called upon to teach its mysteries they best understand to those most willing to appreciate; and thus the army of non-professional artists, consisting of those who being most anxious to appreciate are also desirous to be doing active service, is definitely raised. When the given art has reached a ripened period of its existence, the tide of general culture sweeps away many artificial distinctions, and in the end all participate more or less in the exercise of the artist's gifts and in the enjoyment of an art grown to be universal in its influence. There was a time when only clerks and scholars could read and write, now their once special avocations are exercised by all. Likely enough the professors of reading and writing at one period of the history of the growth of literature jealously cried out for the impossible line of demarcation; but what would be now thought of a protected interest in, for instance, that humble branch of the literary avocation, letter writing! "Wherever there is power, there will "be activity," is an axiom true in every form of natural, social, and artistic life. The musical art has reached that full-grown epoch of its existence, when the warmth and light of its sun-like rays of life-giving beauty are disseminated far and wide, to the vivifying of all who have ears to hear and minds to cultivate. The weeds of the artistic garden are neither to be described as professional or amateur, but are recognised as those who impede the growth of art, or choke the virgin soil by doing false, misleading, and purely self-interested art work; and the flowers and fruit are those, be they professionals or amateurs, who, largely forgetting self-interest, exist primarily for the benefit of the art and its followers. If we look around, the presumably protected professions offer corresponding evidence of the natural effects of growth. The clergy are not able to do the work of evangelizing the world without extraneous aid; so on all sides we find earnest laymen, exhorting, lecturing, and teaching. The medical men are likewise being largely aided by a generally increased knowledge of the laws of sanitation, by the labourers in the cause of temperance, by scientific lecturers and by writers on medical topics. In short, the law of development, by which knowledge becomes power, and power necessitates activity, affects all professions alike, and I venture to assert is beneficially affecting music in our midst. The arguments anent the difficulties of the professional concert-room performers with regard to so-called amateur pretensions, are more specious than accurate. One natural result of a rapid musical growth in this country has been the creation of a perhaps unduly large class of artists whose eagerness of fame has outstripped artistic prudence. Much of the music performed at concerts, again, is of an inferior type, and not equal to the requirements of the present time. Indeed, it would not be difficult to show that good artists and good music find a just, not to say generous, appreciation, and consequently the building up of substantial art claims upon solid merit will leave the complaints alluded to but little force. At the same time, the whole question of concert-giving demands, I know, serious consideration. However, in this, as in every department of the art, ability and earnestness will ever secure a fair success, at least for the good artist, even though there are some abuses and misunderstandings to be cleared away. As regards the broad aspect of the question, skilled work such as calls for a life-time's experience, will always be wanted, and the friendly aid and art-devotion of the non-professional artist will also not cease to be essential requirements of a truly healthy national art-life. It is our business to reconcile the several duties of the two classes of art workers and to effectually dove-tail their mutual interests. Such a course will alone bring real strength to all, and the various members of the same artistic body must learn to be mutually useful, and to accept in its widest and best possible meaning the motto, Dum vivimus vivamus.

INTONING.

THE satisfaction and glory of crowning the edifice of clerical ignorance in musical matters and congregational bigotry, would seem to have been reserved for the chief minister and the more narrow-minded section of a certain congregation attending an important church in one of the leading sea-ports of the south of England. This triumph of needless, bigoted selfishness and blindness to the requirements of the age we live in, is narrated in the letter signed "A Country Organist" which appears in the correspondence section of this week's issue. The eager bigotry of the document now bequeathed to the history of our boasted progress in church music, over-reaches even the narrow-minded intentions of its compiler or compilers. Not contented to ask the choristers to read, rather than intone (to use the verb which is presumed to best express the process of reading on one given sound for the sake of decency and order in the conduct of public worship), this unfortunate notice insists that the reading is to be as unmusical as possible. What, now, is the full meaning of this expression? and what must be the spirit of the writer or compilers? The choristers are not only to be effectually snubbed in the proper discharge of their duties as leaders of the voices of the people, but are called upon to obstreperously and ostentatiously proclaim the temporary strength of the more heedless as the more short-sighted section of the worshippers. Instead of the seemly, orderly self-abnegation implied in the symbolic unity of all voices centred upon a given sound, as expressing the many hearts centred in one sacred act, the choristers are to encourage the congregation to self-actuated, self-inflected, unseemly and disorderly utterances of the most solemn public acknowledgments of human helplessness and divine power. The confession of sins innumerable, demanding a complete self-abnegation, without which the confession is in truth not made at all, and the call for grace which without charity has no practical manifestation, are alike—according to these in all likelihood sincere, but certainly misguided and injudicious, declaimers against "decency and order,"—to be made with an ostentation of self-will, with an expression of the determination of a faction, which must be dangerously irritating in one direction, and dangerously destructive of such real humility as may be possessed by the advocates of "indecency and disorder" in the conduct of public worship themselves. Truly, there can be no greater misfortune to a church than that it should be allowed, from the want of a strong, sensible guiding mind, to become an arena for the evil disposed and uncharitable actions of the victims of that hateful spiritual or rather mental disease, the Odium theologicum. Then, without daring to judge, one pauses with dread to think of the possible thoughts of recrimination and resistful intolerance, such directions and their determined carrying out may give rise to, at the very moment when all should kneel before the Most High in single-hearted abasement and self-sacrificing humility, and with "one voice" to seek for mercy. It is high time that moderate men stepped forward to check the fanaticism of both "high" and "low," and to enforce, wherever possible, such practices as are sensible and seemly, apart from all thoughts of "Ritualism or Puritanism." It is high time, too, to insist upon the general musical education of our clergy, who without such training are not duly prepared for the complete discharge of their high duties and sacred calling. Not less is it the time to teach the people that the uplifting of their voices on regulated musical tones, is the true technical distinction between the functions of united public worship and individual private prayer, and that such musical reading was not only practised in the early Christian Church, but was in prevailing use in the pre-Puritanical days of the Anglican Church. The spirit of the directions to read as unmusically as possible is of the cold, bad, selfish, intermediary period of Church history, when the "quality" slept comfortably in big, square, high-backed pews and the poor sat shivering in "free and (very) "open seats." Perhaps the author or authors of the sage document now being considered meant to direct the unhappy choristers merely to read naturally and in the ordinary, speaking voice; but the tone of the directions appears distinctly to betray a wish that the unmusical qualification is to be unmistakeably evident, and consequently to some offensively prominent. However, we are advancing into happier days when the fever of faction fanaticism will, it is to be hoped, be reduced to a bare existence, if not entirely destroyed, and when service uses will be based alone upon sound and charitable judgment. There are signs of more light, warmth, earnestness, and common-sense in the consideration of matters of church discipline arising from day to day; and soon it will be impossible to address to choristers so stupid, foolish, and weak a manifesto as one requesting them to read as unmusically as possible.

FORM IN VOCAL MUSIC.

III.

THE study of antique melodic idioms is one of much profit and interest, and goes far to show how universal and how very old many of the still and ever-to-be useful tune germs are. SHAKESPEARE tells us of the folly of paying undue respect to antiquity for its own sake:—

> "What custom wills in all things should we do it,
> The dust on antique time would be unswept,
> And mountainous error be too highly heaped
> For truth to over-peer."

All the same "truth" may often be hidden under the dust of antiquity; and in the study of art, history has the two-fold function of showing us what our forefathers did, and teaching us something of the power of art-forms and thought expressions, by showing us how long such forms have successfully influenced the human mind. In our pride at the possession of express trains and mighty steam-ships, we are too apt, perhaps, to forget that wood and iron, hammers, screws and wheels played an important part in the early history of the world, and by their presence in all ages have greatly helped forward—and have ever been and are still absolutely essential—to the growth of mechanical power. So it is in art: certain primary sources of power and action are all-pervading in the development of all types of art; and in none more so than in music, which, although often spoken of as the most modern of the arts, is in its fundamental and primary powers nearly as ancient as speech from whence it sprang. Although the works of the great masters of modern times may truly be said to embody all that is good and powerful in music, the study of ancient musical figures and forms is necessary, in order that the student may be duly impressed with the unalterable value of many of the melodic impulses and constantly applied effects in both tune and harmony which by reason of their universality are neither to be overlooked or rejected, but which if rightly and duly valued are a precious heritage to the composer, and in his hands, as in the hands of his predecessors, are an invaluable source of eloquence and power.

MRS. LAMBORN COOK'S CONCERT.

Mrs. Lamborn Cock's orchestral concert on Monday evening was fully attended. A band, selected from the Philharmonic corps, and conducted by Mr. G. W. Cusins, played the overture to "Egmont" and the March in "Athalie." Mr. Cusins played Sir Sterndale Bennett's lovely Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, No. 4, in scholastic style; he might have produced his own in A minor without offence. The eminent Spaniard, Senor Sarasate, introduced a Suite of Raff, for violin and band, including a prelude, a minuet, and a moto perpetuo. The work, which will be liked and fully appreciated on further acquaintance, was announced as a "first time performance." The Senor, who played some of his Spanish dances, of course electrified his audience. Miss Hilda Wilson's sweet, rich voice was heard to advantage in the air from Mr. Cusins' "Gideon," "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous" (Psalm xxxiv.). Mr. E. Lloyd sang Wagner's air from "Die Meistersinger," "Morning was gleaming," and Mr. Santley an air from Gounod's "Mireille"; Miss Santley also appeared and sang the air from "Joshua," "Oh, had I Jabel's lyre." Mr. John Thomas played the harp solos.

Mdme. Dukas gave at the Steinway Hall, on April 26th, a miscellaneous concert, the third of a series, primarily intended to afford her pupils opportunities for public appearances. Of the vocalists the Misses Esther Joseph, Emmie Lane, Amy Hussey, and Mdlle. Angèle Prudhomme gave many signs of proficiency and promise. A juvenile pianist, Miss Ada Fraser, played a polonaise by Chopin in good style.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The organ recitals were brought to a worthy conclusion last Saturday by Dr. Peace, the well-known Glasgow organist, who received a hearty welcome from a crowded house, every seat being occupied. During the present successful series the engagements have included several of the leading organists of the day, and, in addition, some rising players have been opportunely presented to the public. The opening solo played by Dr. Peace was Handel's "Cuckoo and Nightingale" Concerto, most admirably rendered. Merkel's "Pastorale" in G, Op. 103, and "March for Eastertide" came next. A "Berceuse," by M. Alex. Guilmant, proved to very attractive. An Offertoire, by G. Morandi, in E flat, and Haslinger's "Jubilee" Overture on the Austrian hymn, completed the organ solos, all of which were finely played, and at the close the audience, filling every seat in the hall, warmly acknowledged the performer's great skill by what may be described as quite an ovation. Miss Clara Dowle was the vocalist. She sang Weber's "Softly sighs," showing much promise, but apparently suffering from nervousness. The young lady sang Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," with organ accompaniment. In this there was a want of understanding between singer and organist, who anxiously rendered such obvious though doubtless well meant assistance, to the vocalist as was clearly as perplexing in its way as a due want of support would have been. "Within a mile of Edinbro'" was another song given. Miss Maria Schumann played her violin solos "Andante Rigoletto" (Alard), and "Bird in the tree" (Hauser), with such pure tone, grace, and finish as secured for the talented violinist a very full meed of approval from the audience. So closed the performances of another season. The committee, artists who have appeared, and the thousands of listeners, are to be earnestly congratulated upon the highly satisfactory results gained through such spirited and excellent management. To the Bow and Bromley Institute not only belongs the credit of the establishment of the most varied, successful, and valuable organ recitals to be heard in the whole world, but praise for the erection of an admirable scheme for the propagation of a love of high-class music judiciously dashed with the enjoyment of an admixture of the popular element, which has already done an enormous amount of good. Organ students, lovers of organ music, and the general public, owe to the committee of the institute and their indefatigable, courteous, and far-sighted hon. secretary, Mr. W. Foster, grateful thanks for a series of performances which are unequalled as displaying the largest amount of organ-playing skill ever yet heard in one room, and which have conferred an immense amount of instruction and pleasure upon all classes of society. It is a pity the committee of this notable institution—now famous as a musical nursery wherever art newspapers are read in the English language and Anglo-Saxon lovers of music are to be found—cannot be asked to do for the world and the West End what they have accomplished in the East, by being asked to manage the Albert Hall and its great organ. However, may every success any way attend their valuable labours at the Bow and Bromley Institute, will be the earnest wish of every one interested in the progress of the art and in the advancement of popular taste.

The Redhill Harmonic Society performed Gounod's oratorio "The Redemption," on April 24th. The principal vocalists were : Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. J. Bridson. The orchestra contained some leading players, and the conductor was Mr. Henry T. Pringeur, Bac.Mus. (Oxon), F.C.O.

PROFESSIONAL AND AMATEUR ARTISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I have no doubt many of your readers have seen the remarks that Mr. H. Irving made recently at the dinner given at the Freemasons' Tavern upon the subject of amateurs. His remarks were naturally intended for amateurs in his own profession, but I think they may very well be applied also to the musical profession, and even with greater force. If it be true that the extraordinary large number of amateurs coming upon the stage seems to threaten to sweep away professional actors altogether, how much more truly it may be said that the large number of amateurs and solo instrumentalists who appear in our concert-rooms threaten to ruin the professional artists who find the bread taken out of their mouths? Is it not a fact that many an artist is often induced to sing for very low terms, or even for mere expenses—or for nothing—in order that he or she may keep their name before the public, because they know that if they do not sing or play their part will be taken by some aspiring amateur? I cannot help thinking that the so-called popular entertainments, which have been so plentiful all over the country during the past winter or two, have had much to do in depreciating artistic talent in our concert-rooms. Wherever they have been established, hosts of amateurs, some good, some indifferent, and the majority bad, have come forward, the consequence being that when a concert has been given at which only professional artists have appeared, the attendance has been of the scantiest, and loss has resulted to the concert-giver. That this is attributable to the reason that people prefer to pay their sixpence or shilling at one of these popular entertainments, where they can hear and criticise their own friends, and perhaps enjoy some really good music from two or three professionals, I, for one, have not the least doubt. The remedy Mr. Irving proposed in the case of actors is also applicable to musicians. If professional artists of whatever standard would resolutely refuse to sing or play at a public concert without a fee, I believe the incompetence and self-assurance, which are the chief characteristics equally of amateur actors and musicians, would soon be recognised by the public, and they would tire of attending performances at which only these miserable travesties of the musical art were the only inducements to attend. I am speaking now from experience. During the past winter I have conducted a series of these popular entertainments, for which, I may add, I have received a fee. I had nothing whatever to do in getting up the weekly programme, but whenever artists were announced whose capabilities were known and appreciated there was invariably a much larger attendance than on other occasions. The amount of incompetence on the part of many of the performers whom I have been called upon to accompany or to listen to is simply appalling. On one occasion I got into hot water with the committee for firmly declining to play a comic song, but I maintained my position, and the consequence was that for the rest of the season no comic song of the same type appeared in the programmes. It seems to me that if artists would be true to themselves, to their confrères, and to their art, they would strengthen their position, and by refusing to appear without their usual fee side by side with miserably incompetent amateurs, they would give a death blow to the system by which now-a-days a professional musician is expected to give his services upon every occasion upon which he may be asked.

I am, sir, yours truly,

April 19th. H. E. S.

INTONING versus READING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I think the accompanying "notice" will be interesting to some of your readers, and worthy of being placed on record. It was issued to the members of a choir in a large town in the south of England, with a request, "Please let everyone see this," the words in italics being carefully underlined:—

"NOTICE.—As the Rector and many of the congregation strongly dislike intoning, or anything approaching thereto, and as the present musical way of reading has been mistaken by the congregation for intoning, I must request all members of the choir for the future to read their part in a loud voice, not on one note, but to vary the pitch continually and read as unmusically as possible."

I make no comment, but subscribe myself,

April 30th, 1883. A COUNTRY ORGANIST.

At the dedication festival of St. Mary, Newington, on Tuesday, May 8th, Dr. Bridge's oratorio "Mount Moriah," will be sung, under the direction of Mr. W. Rayment Kirby, F.C.O. Mr. E. H. Turpin, will preside at the organ, and Mr. E. Deane will play the harp.

Passing Events.

Gounod's "Redemption" is to be performed by the Oxford Choral Society on May 17th.

Mr. W. de Manby Sergison announces his first evening concert, at St. James's Hall, on May 29th.

Herr Wilhelmj intends, it is said, to turn his villa at Biebrich into a conservatoire for violin students.

To-day the ninth annual students' concert of the Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte Playing takes place at the Marlborough Rooms, at 3.

The death is announced of M. Octave Foncqué, a highly distinguished Parisian composer and musical critic.

Mr. Jerome Hopkins has produced a child's opera in New York called "Taffy and Munch," as a feature of his eighteenth season there.

Mr. Silas G. Pratt's "Zenobia" was produced lately at Chicago. The composer is known already as the author of several works of merit.

A "Sir Julius Benedict Pianoforte Exhibition," and a "Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition" have just been added to the prizes previously established in connexion with Trinity College, London.

Mr. George H. L. Edwards gave his twelfth evening concert, on April 23rd, at the Town Hall, Poplar, with an admirable classical and miscellaneous selection, and an excellent list of performers.

Jean Jaques Rosseau's "Devin du Village" is to be given at the Châtelet, Paris, presently, in aid of the fund for the erection of a statue to celebrate the memory of the composer and philosopher.

The music for the Sons of the Clergy Festival on Wednesday next, at St. Paul's, includes Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, an effective Service in A by Mr. Myles Birket Foster, and Hiller's "Song of Victory."

The London Literary and Artistic Society held, on April 25th, an interesting monthly conversazione at St. James's Hall. The music was under the direction of Herr Immanuel Liebich.

The Brixton Choral Society give "St. Paul," on Monday next, at the Gresham Hall, under the baton of Mr. W. Lemare, who has done much for the art in the South of London, and deserves the earnest support of the concert-going public.

At the Church of St. Mary Abchurch with St. Laurence Pountney, a special service was held on the evening of Ascension Day. The music included Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, Stainer in B flat, and a selection from the "Messiah."

At a concert given recently at the Holborn Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. Farquharson Walen, a trio written by that gentlemen (the organist at St. Alban's, Holborn), for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, was a feature of the programme. The work, composed during Mr. Walen's student days, has three movements, and is both shapely and interesting, giving promise of future efforts of still greater excellence.

A concert was given on May 1st, at the Holborn Town Hall, in aid of the Fox Court Ragged Schools. The artists were: Miss Fanny Perfitt, Miss Mary Warner, Mrs. Thomas Bound, Miss Ada Robertson, Miss Jessie Dixon, Mr. W. G. King, Mr. C. J. Clarke; pianoforte, Miss Mary L. Harris, R.A.M., and Miss Marian Robbins; cornet, Mr. E. C. F. Hare; organ, Mr. W. C. Harris; conductor, Mr. Thomas Bound.

Sir Michael Costa continues, all will regret to learn, to advance but slowly towards convalescence. He has set his heart upon conducting the Handel Festival if possible, and will, it is said, have the assistance of Mr. Willing at the rehearsals. It is a thousand pities, the best friends of the conductor agree, that he has not given up all thought of undertaking a responsibility now far beyond his age and powers. It is much to be lamented, that the ill-advised and inartistic parade happens just now, and it seems to be a heedless and cruel proposal to call upon the invalid musician to undertake a duty far too onerous for a man who should now be enjoying a complete and well-earned rest.

The Querist.

REPLY.

J. G. W.—A good average height for an organ stool is 2 inches and ½-ths, or from 25 to 26 inches. Care should be take by the player to avoid sitting too high. A position should b chosen which keeps the hands well at the natural level of th middle row of keys, and enables the player to place his fe closely upon the pedals, so as to secure a smooth action of th feet from the ankle joints.—ED. Mus. Stand.

L'Invitation a la Valse..... Weber.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

Only a few men have been really successful in writing a grand symphony. Many have tried and failed. Even Weber, with all his dramatic power and perfect knowledge of the orchestra, was unsuccessful. If, then, it be the lot of the few only to succeed in this, which is universally acknowledged to be the highest branch of modern musical art, who can ensure success in such a work as has been undertaken by Mr. J. F. Barnett? Mendelssohn once contemplated finishing Schubert's Symphony, No. 7, and Mr. Sullivan was, I am informed, asked to do so; but bearing the Italian proverb in mind, A cader va, chi troppo alto sale, he declined the task, for much remained to be done. Very little, indeed, even of the first movement is really complete, and in the andante the bare subject is merely given for violins, and repeated for flutes, whilst in the scherzo a few leading passages only are written for violins and clarinets. The finale is still more difficult to deal with, as it contains only the barest fragments to work upon. Some pages of the score are, with the exception of a solitary horn or violin passage, absolutely bare. It will be thus seen how extremely difficult and hazardous Mr. Barnett's undertaking really was. Of the chain of thought which possessed Schubert, when the scraps which have been mentioned were hurriedly jotted down, it is, of course, utterly impossible to conceive. We often hear of sketches and skeleton copies of compositions, but in this case even the outline is unfinished, leaving each to imagine for himself the idea intended to be conveyed by the finished picture. The words, therefore, which naturally occur to one on contemplating so arduous a task are, Who is sufficient for these things? In Mr. Barnett we have, no doubt, a clever and skilful man, hard-working and ambitious, and he has brought to bear on his impossible task a vast amount of thoughtful and affectionate labour. But even this must tell against him; for there is a readiness of invention and spontaneity of manner in Schubert's works which distinguish them from those of a more laboured character. In Mr. Barnett's work there are, of course, some indications here and there of Schubert's style, amongst which the andante, with occasional passages for clarinets and horns, is a good specimen; but, on the whole, the absence of Schubert's manner and inventive genius is but too evident. The symphony was fairly well played, and not unfavourably received.

Signorina Teresina Tua was most successful in her first appearance here, and one may hope ere long to hear her again, and in at least one piece of music of a more severe and sterling character than those chosen on this occasion.

Miss Thudichum, who is a pupil of the Royal Academy, and who also made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace, acquitted herself with marked success.

R. S.

Of Schubert's Symphony, Mr. T. L. Southgate writes:—

The manuscript Symphony in E, which Dr. Grove designates No. 7, instrumented and completed from the composer's outline by Mr. J. F. Barnett, adds but little to its author's fame. It was sketched out before Schubert had emancipated himself from the influence of the great masters who had preceded him. The Handelian opening, the Haydn-like themes, the Mozartean treatment—so far as the sketchy working can be traced, all betray that Schubert had not yet learnt to think and rely on himself alone. The slow movement is in its way a gem, and though it contains no deep feeling or shows power, its dreamy pastoral tone is very pleasing. The scherzo and trio are the most original portions of the symphony, and in their individuality recall to mind his subsequent workmanship. The finale is exceedingly weak; there is no inspiration in this movement, and it altogether lacks that bright, ringing spontaneous tone that we find in the onward fiery march of his C Symphony, for instance. The movement is ill constructed, becoming towards the end very vague in its general plan. The brilliancy of the coda must be ascribed entirely to Mr. Barnett's cleverness. There are occasionally true Schubert touches in the skeleton, and one can see his customary fondness of repetition and diffuseness, but there is little of special fresh interest to chronicle. Dr. Grove's enthusiasm for all that Schubert has written is too well known to need comment; whether wisdom has been shown in finishing and giving to the world a work the composer himself practically declined so to do, is open to question. But there can be no doubt as to the very great ability and loyal skill with which Mr. Barnett has performed the task set him. On hearing what he has done, it is difficult to believe that we are listening to a joint production. Only a long, faithful study of the master's works could have led to so homogeneous a result. All the Schubert charms are there. The only difference is, that Mr. Barnett is a contrapuntist, and Schubert was rather a melodist and fanciful colourist; so in this symphony, while the old maestro is never obscured with over learning, we see the pen of a practised scholar, filling in and adorning with science the fragmentary work left us. It was significant that the performance excited no enthusiasm.

THE PIANOFORTE PLAYING ACADEMY.

At a matinée of the "Academy for the Development of Pianoforte Playing," in Hinde Street, Manchester Square, held last Saturday in the Marlborough Rooms, Regent Street, the following pupils displayed more or less proficiency, viz., Misses M. Mackeson, Moore, H. M. Wilkinson, Perman, Farrer, Hartog, Hayter, Youle, A. Stewart, McMahon, Hickson, Warren, Rosselli, and Rottenberry. The pieces were chosen from texts of Scarlatti, Mozart, Weber (the Sonata in C, Op. 24), Chopin, Henselt, Schumann, Liszt, and Mendelssohn (first movement of first concerto). Miss Youle particularly excelled in "The Concert Studies" of Liszt; Mr. Clinton played the pianoforte concerto. The performance gave proof of steady work and good teaching under the direction of those excellent professors, Messrs. Franklin Taylor and Oscar Beringer.

MONS. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

PROGRAMME.

Sonata in B minor (Op. 58) ..... Chopin.
Allegro maestoso—Scherzo—Largo—Finale, presto non tanto.
Nocturne in F (Op. 15, No. 1) ..... Chopin.
Fantaisie in F minor (Op. 49) ..... "
Mazurka in C sharp minor (Op. 41, No. 1) ..... "
Scherzo in C sharp minor (Op. 39) ..... "
Ballade in G minor (Op. 23) ..... "
Bolero in C (Op. 19) ..... "
Prelude in E flat (Op. 28, No. 19) ..... "
Etude in E flat (Op. 10, No. 11) ..... "
Valse in A flat (Op. 42) ..... "
Polonaise in A flat (Op. 53) ..... "

There was a time when the fact of a man being able to play, like this gifted Russian, 250 pieces by heart, would have seemed sorcery (Bülow, by the way, boasts of 350 pieces, which he has by heart), but, astonishing as the fact is in itself, it falls into complete insignificance when we consider the exquisite manner in which Pachmann interprets every work. The poetry of his conceptions is as ideal as his execution is marvellous. His shading is unique, there never was such a pianissimo. His touch is of the most refined. Gifted with much physical strength, he remains always well within the capabilities of the instrument. As a Chopin interpreter he is perhaps unrivalled, and to hear him play Henselt, for whom also he has a great reverence, is a treat of the rarest. The encores, of which there were three, and the enthusiasm of the audience, amongst which we counted most of the prominent pianists of London, testified to the high rank that he, comparatively a new comer, has by extraordinary pianistic genius attained.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The presence of Herr Hans Richter among us tends to enliven, in a very marked degree, a musical season which would otherwise (as regards orchestral performances at least) be a remarkably dull one. The programme of the first concert, given last Monday, was in memory of the master with whose latter years the name of Richter has been so closely associated; whom Richter, undoubtedly, beyond any other, has taught us to understand and appreciate; and by whose lifeless body (the grand heart and soul work finished) Richter has stood with sorrowful reverence since we last gave him our hearty welcome.

The programme opened with a "Faust" Overture; which is, formally, one of Wagner's most orthodox productions; though the spirit of it is restless, striving, despondng to an almost painful degree. It is rightly called, as "C. A. B.," the thoughtful annotator of the Richter programmes, points out, "A 'Faust' Overture," for it depicts the typical Faust—the Faust-like character, not the individual Faust of Goethe, or of any other writer. It might have been added that Wagner invariably deals with something vaster than individual lives; for, like Nature herself, he ever appears only :—

Careless of the single life.

Next in order came the prelude to "Parsifal," which again impressed me with its religious solemnity. But it was in the following number, the Prelude and Isolde's "Liebestod," that Herr Richter showed his full power of appreciating Wagner, and revealing him as he is but rarely revealed to us. We have all heard this Prelude and "Liebestod" under several conductors, including Herr Richter himself, but the perfection of this performance has surely been very rarely attained.

The vigorous outpouring of melody, which we have gradually learned to understand and follow, "each moment growing more and more intensely emotional" (I quote from the programme), leads to a climax which the programme calls a "phrenzy." But it was the very absence of "phrenzy" or anything approaching passion in tatters that rendered this performance a memorable one. The reins were firmly held even in the most intensely emotional passages, and the effect of this self-restraint in conductor and performers was to enhance the power, the impressions, and the purity of the music in a scarcely credible degree. The Funeral March from the "Götterdämmerung" brought the Wagner portion of the programme to a close. "C. A. B." has indicated the leading themes of which this most solemn Death Scene is composed; but such an index can at best be but unsatisfactory. It is, for example, scarcely correct to call the first subject given "Siegfried's death-blow"—that was given before the so-called Funeral March begins; for Siegfried survived after receiving it long enough to live over again in thought the happiest moment of his life—the awakening of Brünnhilde. The real death-blow, when heard in the concert-room, is perhaps equal led for thrilling effect only by the "Barabbas" in Bach's "Passion" (St. Matthew); yet when heard in connection with the action, it appears so natural and perfectly in its place as to be scarcely noticed. The subject alluded to might with greater propriety be called the "presence of death," rather than the "death-blow"; for it pervades the scene, like a dire spirit, crushing out the life of even the fresh, youthful Siegfried subject, rising from a low dirge to a fierce agony of struggle with that motive which "C. A. B." calls "Siegfried, the Warrior"; but which is in reality a wonderful amplification of the motive Siegfried plays on his horn. "C. A. B." does not call attention to that touching return of this "horn" motive, brokenly in the minor, near the close of the scene, preceded by the motives of the "Curse" and the "Ring," showing whence death had come to that vigorous, beautiful young spirit; nor does he notice the allusions to the restless questioning of human nature, so well known by Wagner, "Wiss't ihr wie das ward?" to be answered later by Brünnhilde. But who could tell the whole of this wonderful story, so full of detail, when it is never heard without some new point coming to light in each individual listener? The second part of the programme was devoted to Beethoven's C minor Symphony; which, like the earlier numbers, served to reveal the full strength of the well-balanced orchestra, as well as to show in the most favourable light the powers of the conductor.

F. B. WYATT-SMITH.

MDLLE. IDA HENRY'S CONCERT.

The concert of this clever pianist, given at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on the 8th of May, was the second that has taken place in this new building. Spacious and in every respect well appointed, it will no doubt prove a great acquisition to concert-givers. The audience cannot fail to be delighted with the luxurious seats provided for them, and when the glaring white of the walls is softened by ornamental devices, which we understand is the proprietor's intention, it certainly will be the best concert-room in the metropolis.

Mdlle. Ida Hénry is evidently quite at home in chamber music, as her performance of Beethoven's Trio, Op. 11, a sadly antiquated one, by the way, and Schumann's beautiful Quartet, fully proved, and she also fully deserved the applause of her audience for the solo performances, which required the technique of a first-rate pianist.

Miss Thekla Friedländer's excellent rendering of German songs is well known, and was duly appreciated, albeit the choice of Rubinstein's songs was not a happy one. This prolific composer has written some pretty songs, but a great number of them seem to have been suggested by pianoforte passages which often are wire-drawn, and to which he has provided a more or less common and as often unvocal melody.

Mdlle. Henry was assisted by Messrs. Ludwig, Holl-man, and Zerbini, the latter of whom also accompanied the songs in his able manner. The solos for violin and violoncello proved most effective, as could not be expected otherwise from two such first-rate artists. If I object already to transcriptions of Chopin's Pianoforte Nocturne for stringed instruments, I must positively avow a contemptuous dislike to Popper's soul-less concoctions, even when so skilfully rendered. Herr Ludwig's violin playing is of the most refined, his tone noble, his intonation faultless, and his bowing so exceptionally perfect that it might serve as a model to many other violinists of repute. The Caprice by M. Saëns, bristling with difficulties, was masterly executed, but no part of the praise due to the performer can be awarded to so dry a composition. How voluminous and superior the catalogue of pianoforte music is to that of the stringed instruments shows itself at once by comparing the solos, all of artistic merit, which were so ably rendered by Mdlle. Ida Henry—pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Liszt; how different, and yet how interesting every one of them!

MUSIC IN CORK.

A series of four Italian concerts, commencing on April 30th, have been given at the Opera House, under the direction of Signor A. de Gabriele. The programme each night was different, agreeing only in the plan, viz.: First part: miscellaneous; second part: an act from some well-known opera in costume, with chorus, scenery, etc. The following artists appeared during the week: Mdme. Vogri, Mdlles. de Laporte, Moses, and Revelli; Signors A. Byron, A. Salvini, Bolli, V. Bellati, Benghardi, and Breunelli. On Friday night the entire programme consisted of Verdi's "La Traviata" (played in four acts), for the benefit of the conductor, Signor de Gabriele. The three principal parts were cast as under: Alfredo, Sig. A. Salvini; Germont, Sig. Bellati; and Violetta, Mdlle. de Laporte. Mdlle. de Laporte has one of the most beautiful voices that I have had the good fortune to hear from time to time. Thoroughly cultivated, it is perfectly under her control, and one does not require to be much of a prophet to foretell a brilliant career for the talented lady. Several times during the progress of the opera she reached a D flat with greater ease than most average sopranos would sing B flat. Her acting, though good throughout, was not equal however to her singing, although in several parts of the opera she showed a high appreciation of the scenes she was engaged in. Signors Salvini and Bellati also acquitted themselves very well, the latter obtaining a well merited encore for his singing of "De Pronenza il mar." The chorus was very faulty, and a piano which the conductor used in the orchestra instead of the usual harmonium had a most ridiculous effect. Before the curtain rose Signor Enrico Bernini (of Cork), played a fantasia for clarinet and orchestra, founded on airs from Bellini's "La Sonnambula." The house was very well attended. The Carl Rosa Opera Company are expected here on the 21st inst.

M. EUGENE WAGNER'S RECITAL.

M. Eugène Wagner, a native of Alsace, held a recital on Thursday afternoon, May 3rd, at the rooms of Messrs. Collard and Co., in Grosvenor Street. M. Wagner is a pianist of considerable ability, and plays very excellent music, his own inclusive. Great power is combined with a fine touch, and nice observance of nuances. The scheme included Schumann's "Arabesque" and Nachtstück Libolff's "Spinnlied," a nocturne of Chopin, a study of Raff, and A. Henselt's "Poeme d'Amour." M. Wagner's own pieces (all played without a book) were a barcarolle in D flat, "Sur le Lac Léman," a soft melody, with an imitative "current" of semiquavers; a "Menuet Bijou"; a ballade, "Souvenir de la Baie des Anges"; and the "Valse Royale," in D flat, a very pretty pièce de circonstance. Miss Carlotta Peretti, an agreeable mezzo-soprano, sang a lied of Spohr, Gounod's "Au Rossignol," and Mignon's air "Connais tu le pays." Signor Ria made his mark in Tosti's "Good bye," and a romance of Campana. The grand Collard used on the occasion is a fine specimen of the firm's excellent manufacture.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Another comic opera by a local musician saw the light last Wednesday, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. "Foxglove, or the Quaker's Will," is styled an opera in three acts, but it is hardly of sufficient importance, either musically or literally. The dialogue is of a very ordinary character, and the music throughout is of rather too fragmentary a character, notwithstanding the fact that it bears the stamp of a musician, though the flavour of the music is somewhat ancient. Dr. Rohner's best efforts are perhaps in the choral numbers, although some of the solos should not be passed over without a favourable remark; for instance, "The sweet birds are warbling" is a sweet sentimental song, though rather old fashioned, and "Oh dear, if you only but knew," and "'Tis surprising, tantalising," are thoroughly catching in character, and liven up the work considerably. The effect of the first part of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," sung in four vocal parts in the third act, was not effective. Surely Dr. Rhoner is capable of writing a village wedding march? Mr. Chas. Dyall has been more successful in his lyrics than his dialogue. The work was very well represented by a body of amateurs, if we except the representative of Gerald, who might appropriately be styled a tenor in miniature, or a pocket tenor; the character is an important one, and ought to have been in more capable hands. The choruses were well sung by a body of fresh voices, evidently well trained. The composer conducted the two performances (Wednesday and Thursday), and both he and the author were warmly applauded at the first representation. Dr. Rohner is a professor well known and highly respected in this city, and produced some time back an oratorio, "Moses," and a "Stabat Mater." It would rather appear that Dr. Rohner's greater success was in the more solid works. The melodious comic operas by Mr. W. H. Jude and Mr. Frost, produced some little time ago, were, it must be admitted, more successful in catching the public taste than this last effort of a more learned musician, though, no doubt, if it were given with a good professional staff of actors who could also sing, it would be a greater success.

The following is the programme of an interesting concert given by the pupils of the School for the Blind this (Tuesday) afternoon, under the direction of Mr. W. D. Hall:—

Anthem, "I was glad"	Elvey.
Anthem, "Why seek ye the living?"	Hopkins.
Recit., "For behold darkness"	Handel.
Air, "The people that walked"
Chorus, "For unto us"
Organ Solo, cantata, "May Day"	Macfarren.

Mr. Martin Schneider, of this city, an organist of great skill and tasteful accomplishments, has been appointed to the organistship of Mossley Hill Church. There is a fine organ, by Willis, and the church, architecturally, is one of the finest about Liverpool, and has a large and fashionable congregation. The appointment is a valuable one.

BRIXTON CHORAL & ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

At the concert at Gresham Hall, on the 7th inst., Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given in its entirety, with Mesdames Worrell and Raymond, and Messrs. Henry Yates and Lewis Thomas as principal vocalists, Mr. W. Lemare occupying his usual post of conductor. The improvement in the playing of the orchestra (leader, Mr. Decker) noticeable at the last concert, was fully maintained on the present occasion, and considerable care had evidently been taken with the work as a whole. The two grand choruses "Rise up, arise," and "Oh, great is the depth" especially, were given with commendable force and precision, whilst the more placid attributes of "How lovely" and "See what love" produced the impression which such truly beautiful music always has done and always will. Weak spots in the execution were not wanting, however, notably in the duet "We verily" which was attempted—it cannot be said to have been performed—by two members of the chorus, whose names were mercifully omitted from the programme, in a truly deplorable manner. Mr. Lemare ought to have more care for his reputation than to have permitted such an exhibition of incompetence. The beautiful choral "Sleepers, awake" too, was shorn of much of its effect by being accompanied throughout, whereby much of the charm of contrast was lost. In the solos, Madame Worrell gave general satisfaction, her rendering of "Jerusalem" being most admirable; Madam Raymond displayed a powerful voice of the genuine contralto timbre; and Mr. Lewis Thomas was, of course, thoroughly at home in all his work. Of the tenor, Mr. Yates, all that can be said is that he tried to do his best, but that he was evidently over-weighted with his part. His voice is too light for such work, and his style is quite unformed at present. The hall, which has recently been undergoing structural improvements, was crowded by an appreciative audience.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Flotow's "Marta," on Thursday, May 3rd, introduced Mdme. Repetto in the title part. She has a light flexible soprano voice, and warbles like a bird. On Monday this lady undertook the part of the Queen in "Les Huguenots," when Mdme. Furschmedi, the Austrian prima donna, sang splendidly as Valentine, and quite electrified the house. Her voice has great power, and also sweetness of quality. M. Gresse was the Marcel on Monday, and Signor De Reszke the Comte di San Brio. Signor Mierzwinski (Raoul) rather forced his voice, but otherwise did well. Signor Bevignani conducted.

On Saturday, Meyerbeer's heavy opera, "L'Africaine," a posthumous work that had better, perhaps, have been left on the shelf, served for the rentrée of that admirable artist, Mdme. Pauline Lucca, in the title part of Selika, an uncommonly silly one if the libretto alone be looked to. The Slumber Song in Act 2 and the grand dying scena were both magnificent displays of vocal brilliancy and histrionic genius, for Mdme. Lucca is a thoroughly dramatic artist. M. Devoyod, a new baritone, who enacted Nelusko, has a fine voice, but spoils the effect by his French tremolo; he sang well, however, in the prison scene. Signor Mierzwinski, as Vasco di Gama, executed his music unevenly, and forced his high notes de poitrine most distressingly; his Italian orthoepy, too, is open to improvement.

Mdme. Repetto filled the small part of Inez. Signor Bevignani took the time of the famous passage for strings in unison decidedly too fast.

The new tenor, Signor Marconi, achieved a fair success last week as Lionel in "Marta." He has an imposing presence, because tall and of dignified deportment. He dragged the time of the hackneyed air in F, "M'appari tutt' amor," and the action at times betrayed lack of stage experience. Mdme. Tremelli was a smart and pert Nancy. Signor Cotogni won the only encore of the evening for the "Beer Song" of Plunkett.

On Tuesday, "I Puritani" was reproduced, with Signor Marconi as Arturo, and Mdme. Sembrich, another splendid singer, as Elvira.

The production of Bellini's last and best work, "I Puritani," on May 8th, furnished Mdme. Sembrich with an excellent opportunity for vocal display. Her pure, fresh voice, graceful, brilliant singing, and finished phrasing, proved irresistible. Signor Battistini, an excellent baritone, made a good first appearance. "Faust" and "L'Etoile du Nord" were down for performance on the 10th and 12th.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

A more enjoyable concert than that given by Miss Adelaide Mullen, on the 1st inst, at the "Antients," it has seldom been my good fortune to listen to. With most becoming modesty, Miss Mullen allowed the remainder of her profession to take their annual concert before she ventured to seek support for her "first," and from the large attendance and well deserved encouragement she received, I am convinced it will not be difficult to induce her to make the event an annual one also. The talented young artist was supported by the highest members of her profession here, and contributed very largely herself to the rendering of a very select programme. Her selections were "Genevieve," by Sullivan; "Bright days," by Berthold Tours, to which Dr. Smyly played a violin obbligato; "The birds were telling one another," by Smart; she also took part in Sir R. Stewart's exquisite quintet, "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower." Miss Mullen's rendering of the above was in her usual cultured style, and deserving of naught but the highest praise. Mr. Bapty, of whose sweet tenor voice one never wearies, was heard to good effect in C. Villiers Stanford's trying song, "A valentine," and also took part in some concerted music. Mrs. Scott Fennell's singing of "Aprendimi qual," by Rossi, and "Always together," by Molloy, was a faultless piece of vocalism. "The two chords" (Hutchinson), was given by Mr. Grattan Kelly. Two piano solos, by Miss Newcombe would have been most enjoyable, but the effect was entirely marred by the piano being out of tune. A word of praise is certainly due to Mr. Arthur Patton, for the admirable manner in which he conducted the concert, as also to Mr. Williams for his assistance in the concerted music.

The St. Patrick's Oratorio Society are busily engaged in the rehearsal of "St. Paul," which they intend producing at the Cathedral, on 11th inst.

The Carl Rosa English Opera Company are fulfilling a three weeks' engagement here, at the "Gaiety," and, though last not least, the Dublin Orchestral Union again appear before the public, on the 15th inst., with a strong programme.

T. J. B.

SWANSEA.—The Glee and Madrigal Society held its second concert on the 4th, in the Albert Minor Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Matthews. The various pieces were well rendered, before an appreciative audience, by the members of the society. The programme included madrigals, glees, etc., by Walmisley, Callcott, Hatton, Leslie, and a part-song, "The Well of St. Keyne," by Mr. J. Matthews.

BUXTON.—The second popular concert of the season was given at the Buxton gardens, on Saturday evening, May 5th, under the direction of Mr. Karl Meyder. The band played very effectively the overtures to "Maritana" and "William Tell," the March from "Athalie," etc. The vocalist was Miss Clara Wollaston, whose charming rendering of the popular ditties, Molloy's "Punchinello," Hutchinson's "Side by side to the better land," and Watson's "Wayside Posy," gained for her the most enthusiastic applause.

BETHNAL GREEN CHORAL SOCIETY.—A concert, consisting of Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," Macfarren's "May Day," etc., etc., was given May 1st, the soloists being Madame Clara West, whose artistic rendering of the soprano solos greatly pleased the audience; Miss Annie Smith, in place of Miss Lottie West, who was unavoidably absent; Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. Bernard Fountain; conductor Mr. R. A. Slater; pianoforte, Mr. W. West; harmonium, Mr. E. T. Temple. The concert was very successful, especially from a musical point of view.

ST. MARY'S, NEWINGTON.—The annual festival in connection with the dedication service of the first week in May, was held in this church on May 8th. The feature of the service was Dr. J. F. Bridge's oratorio "Mount Moriah." This was sung by the large and efficient choir of the church, the various solos and choruses being carefully rendered. Mr. W. Rayment Kirby, F.C.O., conducted. Mr. E. Deane played the harp obbligato parts, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied upon Lewis's fine toned organ.

HALSTEAD.—An evening concert, announced by Mr. George Leake, A.C.O., organist of Holy Trinity and conductor of the Halstead Musical Society, was held on April 26th. The audience were highly gratified, the concert proving to be the best of the season; the efforts of Miss Agnes Lidel, and Miss Ada Earée, both of the Guildhall School of Music, especially contributing to the success of the evening. The programme, a miscellaneous one, included Haydn's Symphony, No. 4, as a quintet, Guonod's Berceuse, and Chopin's Fantasia Impromptu, admirably played by Mr. Leake. The concert was an enjoyable one.

HULL.—On the evening of April 19th, at the Baker Street Hall, was produced for the first time in Hull, Dr. Stainer's sacred cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus." The soloists were Miss Cheape (soprano), Mr. Russell (tenor), and Mr. Ditchbourn (bass). The chorus numbered fifty voices. Mrs. Scott presided at the piano, and Mr. Hoskins at the harmonium. Mr. Porter, F.C.O, (organist of St. Mary's, Hull) conducted, and the performance was a success. The cantata was succeeded by a miscellaneous selection.

SONS OF CLERGY FESTIVAL.—The annual gathering was held at the Metropolitan Cathedral on May 9th. Sullivan's "In Memoriam" overture, in which the majestic and expressive blending of orchestra and organ produces an effect which makes the work a happy prelude to any cathedral festival, was the first piece. The Service was a setting in A by Mr. Miles Birkett Foster. This is a most attractive work, tuneful, picturesque, expressive by turns, and its composition reflects much credit upon the composer—the organist of the Foundling Chapel. Hiller's "Song of Victory" was the anthem, and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus was, as usual, a feature of the service. The fine choir and excellent orchestra were under Dr. J. Stainer's charge, Mr. G. C. Martin being the organist.

STRATFORD, E.—A concert was given at the Stratford Town Hall, on Thursday, the 3rd inst., under the conductorship of Mr. Sidney Vernon. The vocalists were Miss Clara Dowle, soprano; Miss Minnie Hyem, contralto; Misses James, Foot, and Bloom, and Messrs. Westlake and Waters. Miss Marie Schumann, violin; Miss Emily Fehr and Miss Adela Duckham, pianoforte. Miss. Doyle sang, "Sofily Sighs" (Weber) and "It was a dream" (Cowen) and greatly pleased the audience. Miss Hyem's contributions were "Heaven and Earth" (Pinsuti) and "Two's company" (Roeckel). The violin solos of Miss Marie Schumann were well rendered. Miss Adela Duckham, a child of eight years old, who lately obtained an exhibition at the the Guildhall School of Music and afterwards the first prize for piano playing, at the Stratford Musical Festival, performed a solo in a remarkable manner, and Miss Fehr's piano solo, in "Midsummer night's dream" (Mendelssohn) was splendidly given.

THE UPTON CHORAL SOCIETY.—The second concert of this very flourishing society was given on May 1st, at the Stratford Town Hall, to a crowded audience, and like its predecessor was characterised by marked success throughout. Under the very excellent direction of Mr. Joseph Proudman, the choir recently gained the first prize at the late musical festival held at Stratford, and the society is certainly to be much congratulated for having so rapidly attained such distinction. The programme was composed of Mendelsshon's "Hear my prayer," Macfarren's "May Day," part-songs and, songs. The soloists were, Miss Mary Davies, Miss F. Jones, and Mr. Alfred Kenningham, each of whom sustained the well-merited reputation they have all achieved; the recitatives, sung by Miss M. Davies, being rendered with much feeling and good taste. Mr. A. Kenningham sang in admirable style. The choir, among other part-songs, gave that for which they recently received the first prize, viz, "Now the grass with dew is wet," and were much praised. A duet, "Marche solennelle," was played by Mr. T. C. Kitson (pianoforte), who accompanied during the evening, and Mr. G. B. Gilbert (harmonium); this was effective and much appreciated. Mr. J. Proudman accompanied.

ISLE OF MAN.—The Popular Entertainment Choir and the Douglas Singing Class, conducted by Miss Wood, gave a concert in Ramsey, on Tuesday week last, the Hall being crowded to its utmost capacity. The choir comprised about seventy voices, and the programme included a series of popular pieces, which were fairly well rendered. Mr. G. B. Cowen's song, with choral accompaniment, "Alone at midnight," was well received, as was likewise Mrs. Stanley Nelson's piece, "The Children of the City." Mrs. Valentine charmed her audience with two pianoforte solos, which were brilliantly rendered, and Miss Wood's song, "Going to market," was one of the most successful in the evening's entertainment. "Kate Dalrymple," was sung by the Popular Enrertainment Choir in good style. "Punchinello," a solo, by Miss Marion Smith, was sung with charming sweetness, and was rapturously applauded. Mr. J. E. Bowman's piece, "For ever and for ever," was followed by an amusing glee, "Old Daddy Long-legs," the rendering being very spirited. A duet, "My boat is waiting here for thee," was charmingly given by Miss Idaline Gilder and Miss Marion Smith. Miss Wood is to be warmly congratulated on the great success of her teaching, and also for resolutely declining encores.

MR. CHARLTON T. SPEER'S CONCERT.—Mr. Charlton T. Speer gave an interesting pianoforte recital at the Academy Rooms, on May 2nd. A varied and well-selected programme of works by Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, and other representative composers gave the young artist ample display for his facile execution, power and delicacy of touch, truthful expression, and well prepared technicalities. In G. A. Macfarren's scholarly Sonata, in B flat, for flute and piano, Mr. Olüf Svendsen proved an able collaborateur, both parts being rendered with artistic taste and skill. Mr. Charlton T. Speer's cleverly written impromptu, romance, and polonaise, exhibiting talent of a high order, and of a somewhat advanced type. His effective song "Oh, songs of the olden time," was admirably rendered by Mr. W. H. Brereton, whose other solo, "O ruddier than the cherry," also deserves praise. Mr. Charlton T. Speer is in many ways an accomplished artist, and has, for so young a man, secured a high place in the estimation of a large number of those interested in the progress of English art and artists. His annual recital is a courageous presentation, amply justified by his marked and varied powers, and is an annual exposition of English skill and earnestness which calls for a cordial public recognition.

COVENTRY.—The programme provided by the Coventry Musical Society, on April 30th, attracted a large attendance at the Corn Exchange. The concert commenced with Parts I. and II. of the "Creation," Haydn's first oratorio, and for generations the only rival to the "Messiah" in the favour of the English public. The artists announced were Miss Agnes Larkcom, soprano; Mr. Harper Kearton, tenor; and Mr. Henry Cook, basso; but the latter gentleman was too unwell to appear, and his place was taken by Mr. W. H. Ward, a member of the society. The band was above the average. The chorus sang in good tune and fairly good time, the most noticeable effort being "Achieved is the glorious work." Miss Agnes Larkcom fairly delighted the audience—notwithstanding a cold, which necessitated some apologies on her behalf by the president. After a short interval, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" ("Hymn of Praise") was performed. The band performed the symphony in a masterly style throughout. The chorus music was also firmly sustained, the choir showing more "attack" and life than in the first part of the programme; the chorale, "Let all men praise the Lord" (the first part unaccompanied), was especially worthy of note, as also the final chorus, "Ye nations, offer to the Lord." Miss Larkcom's efforts were well appreciated, and the duet, "I waited for the Lord," by this lady and Miss F. E. Hill, was loudly applauded. Of Mr. Arthur Trickett's conducting, little need be said. His patient work was evident in the chorus, and in the verve with which the whole performance was given, abundantly proving that as a conductor he is in his right sphere.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Signor Ciro Pinsuti has been named a Commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy.

Verdi has, according to Le Ménéstrel, declined to write a work for the next Birmingham Festival.

Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba" will be heard in Hamburg next autumn.

Weber's "Oberon" was lately given in Cologne for the first time, with recitatives by Franz Wüllner, the "Hofkapellmeister" of Dresden.

"The Poor Student" is the title of an opera by Herr Milloecker, of Vienna, which has already been represented more than fifty times in Berlin.

An imposing monument is to be erected in Vienna to the memory of Mozart, who, living there in poverty to receive at the end an unknown grave, is, after the manner of the world, to be now duly honoured, having previously built an imperishable monument to himself in his works.

Le Guide Musical criticizes at some length Gounod's "Redemption," which was performed in Brussels the other week under the composer's direction, and remarks that the solitary specimen of fugue at the end of the work must have been written as a concession to the taste of the English public, who have a particular adoration for Handel, the great master of oratorio and choral polyphonic writing.

The following is a list of the posthumous works of Flotow:—1. "Sacountala," five-act opera, completed; 2. "The Musicians," comic opera on an incident in the life of Mozart; 3. "The Vengeance of the Flowers" and "The Deserter," melodramas; 4. Two concertos for the piano; 5. A Mass; 6. Sixteen songs, and also a bolero for soprano, believed to have been his last composition. A comic opera in two acts is also known to have been completed by Flotow some years previous to his death.

A new humorous cantata, "Miss Kilmansegg," the work of Miss Holland, was performed by that lady's choir at a concert given for a charitable purpose, on May 4th. Miss Holland's setting of Tom Hood's well-known poem is tuneful and appropriate to the spirit of the words. The cantata, published by Messrs. Weekes and Co., will be useful to small choral societies.

LEEDS.

Dr. W. Spark closed his season of recitals on the Town Hall organ on May 5th, playing a selection of Hebrew tunes and music by the Jewish composers, Meyerbeer, Costa, and Benedict. One feature of the performance was the presentation of an illuminated address to Dr. Spark from some of the members of the Great Synagogue, Leeds, in recognition of his services on the occasion of Hospital Sunday. Mr. Edward Butler (chairman of the Leeds School Board), who presided, said he was exceedingly glad that there was so large an audience to testify their gratitude to the borough organist for the recitals. The Rev. J. Groves endorsed Mr. Butler's remarks. The Leeds Corporation have decided upon spending £750 in repairing and cleaning the organ.

AYLESBURY.

Mr. August Gern, of Boundary Road, Notting Hill, has completed an excellent example of a chamber organ, for Charles Threlfall, Esq., of Aylesbury. Although not so large as that built by the same maker for Thomas Threlfall, Esq., of Holland Park, and of which a description was given in a former number, in quality of tone and general effect it is by no means inferior, while the case, which is of walnut, with burnished tin pipes, is one of the handsomest the writer, in the course of a long experience, has ever seen. This instrument, like that above referred to, has been built under the direction of Dr. Steggall, who has expressed his entire approval of the work, both in respect of the mechanism and of the general tone-quality. The builder's improved tubular pneumatic action is applied to the Pedal Organ and also to the front speaking pipes, by means of which the use of long conveyances is obviated. The following is a list of the stops:—

RICHMOND, YORKSHIRE.

On Easter Tuesday, a new organ, built by Abbott, of Leeds, for the Parish Church of the above-named place, was formally opened by the organist, Mr. James Callow, with the immortal "Hallelujah" Chorus. The Service used on the occasion was Woodward in D. Henry Smart's charming "Quasi Allegretto" in G was played during the offertory. The Archbishop of York, who preached, ably sustained the position of music as an important element in Divine worship. The glorious "St. Anne" fugue closed the Service. In spite of a certain roughness (probably inseparable from a new organ), the inhabitants of the ancient borough may be congratulated on possessing an instrument worthy of their fine parish church. The one which it replaced was by G. P. England, and the more valuable portions of his work have been retained. The specifications are as follows:—

MUSIC AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Rev. Dr. W. Sparrow Simpson, has recently printed and issued his fourth biennial Report to the Dean and Chapter; and, since he has intimated that a copy will be sent to any clergyman, precentor, or organist who may apply for one before the stock is exhausted, it will not perhaps be a breach of courtesy to offer a few remarks in these columns on the contents of the Report, intended, as it no doubt is, for external perusal, although at first sight of a semi-private nature.

The first page of the Report contains a warm advocacy of the claims of octavo scores over single voice parts, and here all that I can imagine can be urged in favour of the former over the latter is eloquently put forward by the Succentor. Undoubtedly, "to read the score of a great work is part of a musical education," and, under the system of voice parts, "when a singer's thoughts should be raised to the heavenly ideas presented by the words and by the music, they are reduced to the low level of counting one, two, three, four"; yet, as church music is at present published, nearly all the works of Boyce, Croft, Greene, Gibbons, Hayes, and Purcell, not to mention any of the lesser lights of long ago, must be shelved if the octavo score is to reign paramount; and on referring to the appendices to the Report I see, unfortunately, a pretty clear indication of this fact as the result of the principles advocated on the first page. I do not for a moment profess a veneration for the names mentioned merely because they happened to flourish when the nineteenth century was not; on the contrary, I believe that nothing is more common than to overrate very grossly the "old school" of English church music: still, it appears that the modern school may be fostered, "part of a musical education" afforded to vocalists, and even very young composers encouraged at too dear a price, if that price be the almost entire exclusion from such a service as that of St. Paul's of the works of the fathers of Anglican Church music.

Some excellent remarks will be found on the second page of the Report, apropos of the purchase of music, which I cordially recommend some of our cathedral chapters and their supporters to read, mark, and inwardly digest:—"Nor ought there to be in the case of any cathedral any serious difficulty" as to funds "in this matter of the provision of an adequate library. If the true position of the cathedral as the mother church of the diocese were realised there could be no difficulty; the loyal laity of the diocese would resolve that in each department the cathedral should realise the ideal of divine worship; her services should be the grandest, her music the noblest, as the material shrine is the most magnificent in the district of which she is the centre." Would that they did!

Next follows, of more than local interest, a record of the musical services in St. Paul's during the past two years, and then an interesting page, on which is tabulated the various works given at the Sons of the Clergy Festival since 1860, which will doubtless be useful for reference. The appendices contain a scheme of services for sixteen weeks, which is scarcely as commendable as might be wished; and, with other lists of minor importance, a complete table of the anthems sung in the cathedral during the past year. It would materially add, I venture to suggest, to the interest of the Report another year if the number of times each anthem, and, more particularly, each service has been sung, were also given.

Let me not be misunderstood in any remarks I have now made, or as to any apparent blemishes I have endeavoured, in no spirit of ill-feeling, to point out. That St. Paul's Cathedral has done, and is doing, noble service in the cause of English Church music is beyond question, and most gladly and emphatically do I echo the closing words of the Succentor, "May God bless the grand Cathedral of St. Paul and all who minister within its walls!"

MRS. GENIUS.

(Song of a Sorrowful Hero-Worshipper.)

AIR—"Mrs. Johnson."

Great Mr. Genius takes a bride,
Through life to struggle at his side,
By law, and her own heart-strings, tied To mighty Mr. Genius.
Her task to feed his spirit's flame,
To mend his breeks, and mark his fame,
To meet all bother, bear all blame,
Oh, happy Mrs. Genius!

He to his desk devotes the day;
Shall he be plagued with bills to pay,
Costers or cats to scare away?
Leave that to Mrs. Genius!
His duty is big books to write,
Which give Society delight;
To tend the house from morn till night
Is task for Mrs. Genius.

To halls of light he may repair,
His name is famous everywhere;
She stays at home and suffers there,
Poor jealous Mrs. Genius!

Shall he stint ease or pleasure? No!
She cannot soar, then let her sew,
And sup on porridge; 'twill keep low
The pulse of Mrs. Genius!

He's of an atrabilious mood,
At bearing pain he is not good,
But given to grumble and to brood
And worry Mrs. Genius.
He growls much like a bee-stung bear,
Denouncing all in earth and air,
She loves—and listens; that's the share
Of lucky Mrs. Genius.

Among earth's stars he'll deign to roam,
Sirens his shaggy locks will comb.
Dames pet him. She can patch, at home
The dressing-gown of Genius.
Of letting her make friends he's shy.
No, let her feeble fingers try
To wring wet sheets (with wetter eye)
Poor, lonesome Mrs. Genius!

OPENING OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE Charter granted by her Majesty to the Royal College of Music was formally issued last week, and on Monday his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales inaugurated the new institution with a speech singularly graceful and redolent of English common sense. The lofty mission of our art was thoroughly recognised by his Royal Highness; in pointing out in eloquent terms the elevating effect upon the best feelings of the human heart that the cultivation of music produces, he displayed a breadth of view, which distinguishes the true thinker, from the conventional talker. The readers of this journal do not require to have again detailed the various steps of the movement which has culminated in the ceremony of Monday last. The course of the scheme has from time to time been brought under notice, and subjected to criticism in these pages. Now that the institution is a fait accompli, we must first thank the Prince for the persistent energy he has shown in striving for the accomplishment of the scheme unfolded at St. James's Palace; and further congratulate him on the success achieved in the raising of so large a sum as £110,000, and the opening of the school within so short a period as that of fourteen months. The hearty response that the country has accorded to his appeal shows, that at the time of the now historic meeting he had correctly gauged both the wants of the people, and also their ready appreciation of the plan there enunciated. In the second place, now that the machinery has been completed, and the school has commenced its active duties, it behoves all to whom music is dear, in the words of Sir Frederick Leighton at the banquet of the Royal Academy of Arts the other evening, to wish God-speed and every prosperity to the infant just launched on the world. There are many among us who feel that the Royal Academy of Music has not been fairly treated. It has been maintained that if this old institution, which, by its art-fruits, has established an enduring claim on the country, had received an adequate measure of support, allowing it to offer free scholarships to meritorious but poor pupils, all (and even more than) the advantages claimed for the new school would have been completely achieved. But a different course has been taken. The time has not yet come to make public the negotiations between the supporters of the two schemes. While simply remarking that union has failed, it will suffice to observe that the rivalry between the schools need not necessarily be of an unfriendly character. The lines they respectively run on are parallel rather than divergent, and so the goal reached in both cases is much the same. It is therefore of no use bewailing the fact that the Royal Academy has not been selected to carry out the task his Royal Highness has mapped out. A new departure has been made, and it becomes those who have not looked with favour on the novel scheme, but who still have the true welfare of music at heart, to assume at least an attitude of benevolence towards the school just opened. If a cordial support cannot as yet be universally accorded to it, let those who have—not without many good reasons, doubtless—felt constrained to oppose it, remember that we English pride ourselves on a fair hearing; the authorities of the Royal College of Music are at least entitled to expect this from all. They will have plenty of thorny questions to trouble them in the future, both internal and external; wherever therefore it is possible, let a generous support be given by musicians to their endeavours so long as an earnest striving for the best interests of the art is apparent.

The establishment of the College undoubtedly marks an epoch in the history of English music; whether under its fostering care a truly national school of music, national in all the branches of the art, will be created, is doubtful. But this may be pointed out: the native element is strong, very strong, both on the council and teaching staff; its director, though not a practical musician, is an Englishman of undoubted talent. It is an open secret that we have been saved from the ignominy of having some third-rate German foisted on us by the practical sense and strong national instinct of the Prince of Wales.

In the various phases and details connected with all the arts opinions will vary, and conflicting ideas always exist; such a condition indeed is of vital necessity if we are to enjoy healthy progress, instead of somnolent satisfaction. There is plenty of room for discussion as to the best modes of tuition, and the right course of study. Such discussions can do no harm, and will rather aid in helping to produce the concrete results of experience and wide culture. It is but natural that the governing body of the College should have faith in themselves; that quality is the prime factor in ultimate success. But they must also beware of the dangers of optimism, and should welcome, rather than repel, criticism on their doings. Faddism is becoming one of the unpleasant features of the age; it must certainly not be allowed to obtain at the Royal College of Music. However clever a teacher may be, he must subordinate his purely private opinions to the methods generally accepted by a united staff. If one teaches harmony according to a system which another professor sturdily combats, the house will be divided, to a certain extent, against itself, and we have good authority for predicting what the result will be. In the precise value to be attached to the works of the masters of various countries, in the selection of suitable pieces, in the way in which musical history is read, in pointing out to the student and impressing on him the true principles which underlie and should ever govern true progress in all branches of the art, in the determination of the right length of lessons, as well as on many other points, conflicting opinions will probably prevail. It will be the duty—not an easy one—of the council and director to discriminate on such matters, and institute a judicious uniformity in system that should be observed by all the staff. This plan of a set method obtains at the Paris Conservatoire, and its advantages are too obvious to need comment. Thoughtful musicians know well of what vital importance it is that the course of study should be rigorously systematic, and not desultory, just at the whim of either master or pupil. There should be a prescribed period for the study of the works of each prominent builder up of the edifice of music. Every step in the onward march of the art should be appreciated, and mastered before proceeding to the next standpoint. This straightforward course the "fad" professor objects to. If his clever pupil can get through a Liszt concerto, he deems it waste of time to detain him over the earlier works of such pioneers as Mozart and Hummel. Another master will concentrate all his energy in teaching his pupil well-known excerpts from popular operas, ignoring with disdain the great teaching value of the pure works by the Italian masters of a generation ago. Yet another, will encourage a student to essay orchestral crudities, who has not yet mastered the art of writing simple vocal flowing sentences. These few instances show the necessity of an early regulation of the course of study to be followed, and an insistence of the abnegation of crotchets, from those who suffer from this common form of conceit. All the details of the teaching will soon become known to the outer world, and with that knowledge will inevitably come criticism. But this is not to be deplored; it ought to do good all round, it should spur on sluggish pupils, revivify tired teachers, and animate the staff to fresh striving after healthful progress.

The criticisms that from time to time have appeared on the scheme generally have been of decided utility, various modifications that have thus been suggested having been adopted. And here one may remark that efforts should be made to disabuse the minds of many of the public of the crass idea, that the institution will supply us with shoals of Beethovens, or

"Max Bruchs," as one speaker, with delicate irony, put it. The primary object of the Royal College is to discover and train latent talent. When its old pupils are scattered over the country, they can then diffuse a true appreciation and correct knowledge of the art around their several centres. Geniuses are the works of Providence, and not the productions of schools. It is remarkable that no great musician has ever come out of a musical conservatoire; our own R.A.M., with Macfarren, Sterndale Bennett, Sullivan, Mackenzie, and some others, probably scoring the best. Fancy fifty Beethovens turned out per annum! What would they do? And if each one made as wide a departure from previous types as the greatest of tone-poets did, what a fearful condition poor Music would get into! Happily, such a plethora seems a physical impossibility; during the last four hundred years, the united civilized world has not produced a dozen men of this exalted type. Such tall talk as has been indulged in on this head, should be discouraged. It savours too much of trade advertising.

There are several points in the Charter that offer suggestions for comment, but space does not permit to notice them in detail. Conspicuous, however, is the clause directing that the Board of Professors is to be subject to the Council. Those who are acquainted with the history of the Royal Academy will remember that when it seemed the end had come, it was found that the amateur Directors were responsible for the condition of things, and not the Professors. Contrary to general opinion, the amateurs proved themselves to be worse men of business than the teachers; their ornamental dis-ability nearly wrecked the institution. Professional men are rightly jealous of amateur interference. When it is remarked, that out of the twenty names that constitute the members of the Council, only three can claim to be professed musicians, it will be observed that here is an element of weakness, if not of absolute danger. The degrees which the institution is empowered to confer are wisely not to be limited to the students educated within its walls. All in the country worthy of the honour are eligible, and one is glad to see that the legitimate claims of women have been recognized. As independent examiners are to take part in the distribution of these distinctions, it practically places the Royal College in the position of an University, in connection with all the schools, and so its degrees and certificates will be valued and recognized throughout the land. Nothing is said in the Charter as to for whom the benefits of the institution are to be reserved for. His Royal Highness intimated in his speech that it was intended to be Imperial, and that all who owned the sway of her Majesty were eligible. It would be well to set this matter clearly forth, for complaints are already rife that some of its students are foreigners; if this is so, it will certainly stop the further flow of English subscriptions. In another column will be found a letter as to the fees charged for paying pupils. This matter requires careful consideration. The terms fixed are higher than those charged at the R.A.M., where more is given for the money, without taking into account other advantages it offers to students. Moreover, the charge is much higher than that which obtains at the foreign conservatoires, and we were told, among other things, that this new school would prevent English students from going abroad for musical instruction. No mention is made in the scheme for provision of studies in opera. A national stage where the national drama in conjunction with music can find a home, will eventually have to form a necessary addendum.

The conclusion of the Prince of Wales' speech, in which he stated that Her Majesty graciously intended to signalise the event of the day by conferring the honour of knighthood on Dr. G. A. Macfarren, Dr. A. Sullivan, and Dr. G. Grove, will strike a sympathetic chord wherever the English language is spoken. In the case of the doyen of our realm of music, the honour is not only a tribute of admiration for his genius, but in decorating the worthy head of the Royal Academy and Cambridge Professor, it is shown that while honouring the new school, the old one has not been slighted, and the graceful distinction conferred is a formal mark of the value in which the most popular art of our country is held. In Dr. Arthur Sullivan we possess a genius in the prime of life whose facile pen has ranged over the whole field of the art, giving us in the "In Memoriam" overture and "The Light of the World," true music ranking far above the trifles of comic opera. The untiring energy and enthusiasm which Dr. Grove has long exhibited in the cause of music, independently of his brilliant literary qualities, mark him out for distinction. To his perseverance and great devotion, must be attributed in no small degree the firm and speedy establishment of the new school of music.

OPENING OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The College, situated close to the Royal Albert Hall, was opened on May 7th, at noon, by the Prince of Wales (the President), who was accompanied by the Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and the Princess Christian. Among those present were, Mr. Gladstone and Miss Gladstone, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lady Folkestone, Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, Sir C. J. Freake and Lady Freake, Mrs. Courtenay, the Lord Mayor, Alderman Sir Whittaker Ellis, Sir H. Thring, Sir Richard Wallace, M.P., Sir John Rose, Mr. Charles Morley (Hon. Secretary), and Mr. H. Morley, Dr. George Grove (Director of the College), Sir Cunliffe Owen, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, Dr. Bridge, Mr. Joseph Barnby, Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Mdme. Goldschmidt, the Rev. Randall Davidson, Mr. T. P. Chappell, Mr. E. W. Hamilton, Mr. Henry Leslie, Dr. Stainer, Mr. Charles Hallé, Sir George Elvey, Mr. Charles Godfrey, and Mr. Albert Lowe. Their Royal Highnesses were received by the trustees, the director, and the honorary secretary, by whom they were conducted to seats in the corridor on the second floor, where suitable preparations had been made for the inaugural ceremony. The pupils of both classes—students holding scholarships and paying students—were all assembled in rooms at the side of the corridor, and they witnessed the proceedings of the day. The ceremonies commenced with the offering by the Primate of the following special prayer for the opening of the College:—

O God, who art the only Author of order and beauty, bless, we beseech Thee, this College to the perfecting of science and skill in Thy pure gift of music; and grant that the good intent of its founders may be so answered in the diligence and virtue of its students that both the restful delight of man and the glory of the Divine worship may be enhanced ever more and more, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

This was followed by the Collect, "Prevent us, O Lord," and the Lord's Prayer.

DR. GROVE (the Director of the College) read an address. He commenced by alluding to the meeting held at St. James's Palace on the 28th of February, 1882, at which the scheme of founding the College was launched, and to the numerous meetings held subsequently in London and many provincial towns in support of the object. By these meetings, continued Dr. Grove, and by the personal exertions of your Royal Highness and your illustrious brothers, a sum of money, amounting to over 110,000*l.*, has been raised, of which nearly £6,000 was due to the gracious action of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. Included in this are four private scholarships, founded by the generosity of private individuals, viz. :—The Courtenay Scholarship, founded by Miss Courtenay in memory of her brother, Frank Courtenay, Esq.; the Wilson Scholarship, founded by Sir Erasmus Wilson, F.R.S., F.R.C.S.; the Morley Scholarship, founded by Samuel Morley, Esq., M.P., and two sons, Howard and Charles; the Elizabeth Pringle Memorial Scholarship, founded by her daughter, Lady Harvey, of Langley Park, Slough; and two others have even been founded in Australia, one by Sir W. J. Clarke for the southern colony of Victoria, and one by Sir Thomas Elder for that of South Australia. The scholar for the former of these was elected on the 1st of February, and is now on her way from Melbourne to the College. These funds, though not half what are necessary for the complete realisation of your Royal Highness's plan, have enabled you to take possession of this building erected by Sir Charles Freake, and munificently presented by him to your Royal Highness. They have also enabled you to begin the College with a considerable instalment of the entire plan by founding 50 scholarships for tuition, 15 of which include maintenance. The professors selected are such as to give confidence as to the high character of the instruction. The piano is in the hands of Mr. Pauer, Mdlle. Arabella Goddard, Mr. Franklin Taylor, and Mr. John Francis Barnett. To forward our interests, Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt has emerged from her retirement, and singing will be taught by her, Mr. Deacon, and Signor Visetti. The violin is in the charge of Mr. Henry Holmes and Mr. Gompertz, the organ of Walter Parratt. Counterpoint and composition are taught by Dr. Bridge, Mr. Villiers Stanford, and Dr. Hubert Parry; while among the professors of other instruments are the honoured names of Harper, Lazarus, Thomas, and other ornaments of the English school. Declamation will be specially cared for, and for this the names of Mrs. Kendal and Mrs. Arthur Stirling are sufficient guarantee. The competition which has taken place throughout the country for the 50 scholarships is in itself ample proof, if proof were needed, of the justness of your Royal Highness's idea. Following the method adopted in launching the institution, your Royal Highness appealed to the mayors, corporations, and local boards throughout the country, and in the metropolitan districts to the vestries, to make known the fact of the competition, and to organize the preliminary examinations, selecting the examiners from the most eminent local musicians. The result was as successful as might have been anticipated. The Municipal Buildings were put at the disposal of the College, and the best musicians were prompt to give their services as honorary local examiners to a task which in many cases involved great labour and severe sacrifice. Dr. Grove gave an account of the recent examination. He continued :—Time will not allow me more than an allusion to various acts of private generosity by which the College has benefited. Prominent among them is the gift of the library of the late Sacred Harmonic Society through Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen, and various other gifts of pianos, furniture, etc., by Sir Charles Freake, Messrs. Broadwood, Messrs. Erard, Messrs. Chappell, Messrs. Holland, Feltham, and others. The professors, scholars, and students are awaiting your Royal Highness's notice at the close of these proceedings, and I trust your Royal Highness will believe that we are all alike animated by a sincere and enthusiastic desire to carry out to the full those wise and gracious designs which have brought us to this first step in our career. That your Royal Highness may long live to preside over us and guide us in the right path, is our humble and earnest hope and prayer.

The PRINCE OF WALES said :—I have heard your address with pleasure, and I feel great gratification in opening to-day the Royal College of Music, in the promotion of which I have taken so deep an interest. I avail myself of this the first public opportunity that has offered itself of expressing the deep personal gratification I feel at the manner in which the country has replied to my appeal for aid in establishing the College. There is no class of her Majesty's subjects capable of affording assistance to which I have addressed myself in vain. The Corporation of London and the London Companies have led the way in giving pecuniary assistance; and I owe a debt of gratitude to the mayors throughout the kingdom for the valuable aid they have afforded by granting facilities for holding local examinations essential to the proper selection of scholars. I thank these great bodies for their services, and I trust that I may yet expect from them further help in completing the task so auspiciously begun; I thank the donors of scholarships for their liberality; I thank the general public for the sums they have subscribed at a time when agriculture has been depressed and the prospects of trade have not been encouraging; and, above all, I thank the many kind friends who have responded so cordially and liberally to my appeal for assistance. I have noticed also with the greatest pleasure the contributions for Colonial scholarships that have been given by two eminent colonists, the one on behalf of the colony of Victoria, and the other on behalf of the colony of South Australia. The object I have in view is essentially Imperial as well as National, and I trust that ere long there will be no colony of any importance which is not represented by a scholar at the Royal College. Much indeed has been done, but I am aware that much remains to be done. I am conscious that I may be thought to have taken a bold step in beginning so great an enterprise with only the resources at present at my command. But I am unwilling that any delay should take place in giving effect to the generous intentions of those who have already contributed so liberally. I am sanguine enough to think that the example set during the last year by corporate bodies, representatives of the colonies, private donors, and the general public will be followed in ensuing years. Ours is an institution which admits of almost indefinite extension, for wherever a scholarship is founded, we know now that we shall find a deserving candidate to hold it. Let me now pass to an account of what has been actually accomplished. Fifty scholarships have been established, of which 35 confer a free education in music, and 15 provide not only a free education, but also a maintenance for the scholars. Of these scholarships half are held by boys and half by girls. I observe with pleasure that the various districts from which the scholars are drawn indicate the widespread distribution of a taste for music throughout the United Kingdom. London with its vast population, sends only 12 out of the 50. The remaining 38 come as follows:—Twenty-eight from 14 different counties in England, two from Scotland, six from Ireland, one from Wales, and one from Jersey. The occupations of the scholars are as various as the places from which they come. I find that a mill-girl, the daughter of a bricklayer, and the son of a blacksmith, take high places in singing, and the son of a farm-labourer in violin playing. The capacities of these candidates has been tested by an examination of unusual severity. Each of these scholars who returns to his native place furnished with the highest instruction in music will form a centre from which good musical education will spread around; while those who obtain musical engagements elsewhere will stimulate and encourage by their success the cultivation of music in the places whence they have come. Surely, then, it is not too much to expect that many years will not pass away before our College has so popularized music as to place England on a par with those countries on the Continent which have acquired the distinction of being called musical peoples. I feel, then, that one great object of a College of Music has been secured—namely, the discovery of latent musical ability, and the extension to those who, with great natural gifts, have been blessed with little of this world's goods, the opportunity of obtaining instruction in music, to say the least, not inferior to any which this kingdom can afford. That these words are not the language of exaggeration will be apparent to those who read the names of the eminent staff who have placed their services at the disposal of the College. Side by side with these scholars will be educated a group of paying pupils, who think that music is an art which, if worth studying at all, is worth studying well. They are then prepared to enter upon a systematic course of instruction, of less severity and continuance than that of the scholars, but still far removed from the musical dilettanteism of those who, induced by fashion, not by taste, to study music, make progress enough to torment themselves and distract their friends. (Laughter.) I lay great store by the meeting of the various classes of society in pursuit of a common yet elevating study. Such a union softens asperities, inspires kindly feeling between various classes, and proves that all mankind are akin when engaged in an art which gives the highest expression to some of the best and purest feelings of the human heart. The observations I have hitherto made relate only to the Royal College of Music as a teaching body. It is not proposed, however, that the functions of the College should be restricted to teaching. The charter under which we are incorporated provides that the Council are to cause examinations to be held of pupils of the College, and of other persons who may present themselves for examination, and after examination to confer on those who deserve such distinctions the degrees of Bachelor of Music, Master of Music, and Doctor of Music, certificates of proficiency, and other rewards. I propose that this power should be exercised by an independent board of examiners chosen by the Royal College in conjunction with the universities, and after consultation with the great musical authorities in the United Kingdom. I trust thus to secure an examining body whose impartiality will be above suspicion and capacity above all question. I hope thus, through the instrumentality of the Royal College, to raise the standard of music throughout the United Kingdom, and to create a central influence which may be beneficially exercised over all music-teaching bodies who recognise the advantage of a common system of examination. Beyond and above all this, I trust, as I stated on a previous occasion, that the College will become the recognised centre and head of the musical world in this country. It has been a reproach to England that with her vast resources, her large benevolence, her eagerness to instruct all classes of society in other branches of knowledge, one thing has hitherto been wanting—a national institution for music. Yet music is in the best sense the most popular of all arts. If that government be the best which provides for the happiness of the greatest number, that art must be the best which at the least expense pleases the greatest number. I trust that to-day we have removed the reproach. England, by a national subscription, has acquired an institution worthy to be called national, and with the establishment of such an institution we may look forward with confidence to the creation of a National School of Music. England has the composers already; all she wants is a general centre, such as the Royal College of Music, to which they may resort for mutual aid and common inspiration. (Cheers.) Such are the aims, not mean nor ignoble aims, proposed for the College which we open to-day. It remains for you, gentlemen of the council, to be careful that these aims are fully realised. A young institution requires fostering care and constant supervision. You must not relax your efforts. No pains must be spared to gain fresh support, and obtain the establishment of new scholarships. We want much—we are, I trust, entitled to ask for much—of the public. In addition to scholarships we want more extended premises, a music hall, lodgings for our scholars, houses for masters, and all the appurtenances of a great college. I am sure I may trust to the generosity of the public to supply these wants; but you, gentlemen, must by your careful supervision make our institution worthy of support, and no efforts of mine shall be wanting to secure the objects we have in view. (Cheers.) I will say only one word in conclusion. The establishment of an institution such as I open to-day is not the mere creation of a musical society. The time has come when class can no longer stand aloof from class, and that man does his duty best who works most earnestly in bridging over the gulf between different classes which it is the tendency of increased wealth and increased civilization to widen. I claim for music the merit that it has a voice which speaks in different tones, perhaps, but with equal force, to the cultivated and the ignorant, to the peer and the peasant. I claim for music a variety of expressions which belong to no other art, and therefore adapts it more than any other art to produce that union of feeling which I much desire to promote. Lastly, I claim for music the distinction which is awarded to it by Addison—that it is the only sensual pleasure in which excess cannot be injurious. What more, gentlemen, can I say on behalf of the art for the promotion of which we are to-day opening this institution—an institution which I trust will give to music a new impulse, a glorious future, and a national life? Before I quit this room, a further duty devolves on me—a most gratifying one, I admit. I am called upon to announce a most gracious act by which the Queen has been pleased to mark her interest in the opening of the Royal College. Her Majesty authorises me to say that she proposes to confer the honour of knighthood on Professor Macfarren and Dr. Sullivan. (Cheers.) If anything could add to my satisfaction in making this statement, it is this, that these honours are bestowed by the advice of the Prime Minister, who has taken so kind an interest in the promotion of the Royal College, and who could have devised no better mode of celebrating its opening than by recommending that honour should be done on this occasion to music by conferring knighthood on men so celebrated in their art as Professor Macfarren and Dr. Sullivan, and that honour should be done to our College by awarding a like distinction to its director, Dr. Grove—(renewed cheering)—who, eminent in general literature, has specially devoted himself to the preparation and publication of a Dictionary of Music, and has earned our gratitude by the skill and success with which he has worked in the difficult task of organizing the Royal College. I have only to add that the Prime Minister by his presence to-day proves that neither the cares of State nor the overwhelming press of business by which he is surrounded, prevent him from giving personal countenance to a national undertaking which, if I am right in what I have said, is calculated to advance the happiness and elevate the character of the English people. (Cheers.)

At the close of his Royal Highness's reply the professors proceeded with their pupils to the various class-rooms, which were afterwards visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales and the other Royal visitors. Their Royal Highnesses spent altogether about an hour in the building; and before leaving signed their names in the visitors' book.

The work of the College starts with the fair number of 92 students, including 42 paying scholars. Most of course are devoted either to pianoforte or singing. The result of the labours of the professors and the future of the institution will be looked forward to with no small amount of public interest.

On May 8th, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales gave what may be almost called a Royal College of Music dinner party, the guests including the following musical men: Prof. G. A. Macfarren, Sir J. Benedict, Dr. J. Stainer, Dr. Sullivan, Mr. J. Barnby, Herr Otto Goldschmidt, Mr. George Mount, Mr. W. G. Cusins, Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. T. Chappell, Dr. George Grove, Mr. C. Morley, and Mr. Kellow Pye.

Madame Nilsson made her first appearance since her recent return to England, at the Albert Hall on May 9th, at a concert given by Messrs. Austin and Watts.

THE NEW MUSICAL KNIGHTS.

The bestowal of the honour of knighthood upon Prof. G. A. Macfarren, Dr. A. S. Sullivan, and Dr. G. Grove, is a gratifying incident of the time chosen for the opening of the Royal College of Music. In the case of Prof. Macfarren, knighthood is honoured; the cause of honest artistic labour, and England as an artistic nation too, are alike honoured by the bestowal of a title upon Prof. Macfarren, as a man of genius, unswerving earnestness and faithfulness to the best interests of an art which is one of the mightiest engines of the world's civilisation. To Dr. Sullivan the honour is a recognition of well cultivated gifts. As a popular English composer, Dr. Sullivan indeed stands in a position which can only be described as unique. It is true he has enjoyed unparalleled opportunities and advantages, but it is equally true that he has never failed to make good use of them, and it has been his task to successfully prove how widely popular the name of an English composer can be made. The claims of Dr. G. Grove are intimately connected with the progress of music in English during the last twenty years, as in his labours in connection with the popularization of high-class orchestral music at the Crystal Palace; in the bringing forward of much English and German music, and notable in his share of the work of unearthing Schubert's great works, in the compilation of his valuable "Dictionary of Music," and as regards his acceptance of the high position of Director of the Royal College of Music. Viewed broadly, the bestowal of these honours will aid in the social and artistic advancement of English music and musicians; and not only are the recipients to be congratulated upon this occasion, but the entire profession, as upon the receipt of what is at once a new token of the advancing status of the musician here, and an acknowledgment of the daily increasing popularity of music in our midst.

Below is added a brief biographical account of the three gentlemen. E. H. T.

Mr. George Alexander Macfarren was born in London in 1812; he was educated at the Royal Academy of Music, and has produced several operas, oratorios, and a large number of musical compositions of all descriptions. Fifty years ago, when he was a student, he composed his "Chevy Chase" overture, and it was performed under Mendelssohn's conducting at the concerts of the Gewandhaus, Leipzig. Under the direction of Dr. Macfarren, Mendelssohn's "Antigone" music was first performed in London. Forty-two years ago he composed a cantata in honour of her Majesty's marriage; and since then he has written a large number of works in one style and another. To speak of his operas alone, he brought out in 1846 "Don Quixote," at Drury Lane; in 1849 "King Charles II." at the Princess's; in 1860 "Robin Hood," at Her Majesty's; and in 1864 "Helvellyn," at Covent Garden. Among his sacred works are two admirable oratorios, "John the Baptist" and "Joseph," and of his cantatas, "May Day" holds the chief place. Dr. Macfarren has also wielded the critical pen, and the poetical analyses of musical works that he has done for the Philharmonic Society's programmes are singularly valuable. The works he has written on the science of Harmony, chiefly on the Day theory, constitute a most important English contribution to the scientific aspect of the art. Dr. Macfarren is well-known as a powerful and successful lecturer on music. In 1865 he was appointed a member of the board of professors at the Royal Academy of Music, and in 1875, on the death of Sir Sterndale Bennett, he was elected to the Professorship of Music at Cambridge University, and was created Doctor of Music the same month. Although Professor Macfarren labours under the severe affliction of blindness, as a teacher, he has been very successful. His thorough grasp over all that comes before him, and his marvellous memory excite the astonishment of those who are brought into relation with him.

Mr. Arthur Sullivan was the son of the Principal of the Kneller Hall establishment. He was born in 1844, and entered the Chapel Royal, St. James's, as a choir-boy. On leaving there, he became a pupil of the late Sir John Goss, and in his sacred compositions has caught no small reflection of that master's lofty and beautiful church style. He afterwards briefly studied music, in Germany, and entering our Royal Academy gained the Mendelssohn Scholarship. He soon became famous for his compositions. "The Tempest music," the "In Memoriam overture," and his first symphony showed his striking ability. Since the production of these earlier works, his genius has ranged over a wide extent of subjects. His contributions to comic opera, "The Contrabandista," "H.M.S. Pinafore," "Trial by Jury," "Patience," and "Iolanthe," have obtained for him a wide celebrity on both sides of the Atlantic, and no small amount of wealth, it may be added. But in his "Festival Te Deum," "The Prodigal Son," "The Light of the World," and "The Martyr of Antioch," as well as in his numerous Anthems, he has displayed till higher qualities. He was the director of the National Training School for Music, the embryo of the New Royal College; the hon. degree of Doctor in Music was conferred on him by the University of Cambridge in 1876.

Mr. George Grove, D.C.L., was born at Clapham, in 1820. He was educated for a civil engineer, and was employed on the staff of Mr. Robert Stephenson, in the construction of the Chester and Holyhead Railway, and the Britannia Bridge. In 1850 he was appointed secretary to the Society of Arts, and shortly after, became secretary to the Crystal Palace Company, an office he held for many years, and with no little advantage to the cause of good music. On leaving Sydenham, he joined the firm of Messrs. Macmillan, of whose eclectic Magazine he is editor. He is also the compiler of the valuable "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," still unfinished, and he took an active part in the formation and management of the Society for the Exploration of Palestine. In 1875 the University of Dublin conferred on him the honorary degree of D.C.L.

HENRY PURCELL.

In the course of his lecture upon the "Life and Dramatic Compositions of the English Mozart," recently delivered at Leeds, Dr. W. Creser said:—

A consideration of the life and dramatic works of one who had long been regarded as the representative or type of English composers would probably be interesting. Unfortunately for dramatic musical art in England, Purcell died at the early age of 37, and before he had fully established his style. This misfortune, and the prevailing fashion for Italian and French music, completely overwhelmed the English school. Nevertheless one other composer of sterling merit did follow Purcell, namely, the gifted Arne, the composer of "Rule Britannia." He might have placed the English school on a firm basis, but failed to do so, owing to a too great adherence to the musical idioms of the rival schools of France and Italy. At the present time there was a great hope of a resuscitation of the true English school. He used the term resuscitation advisedly, for it was certain that during the reigns of King Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth the English school was equal in point of genius and national character to that of any other nation, and he took it that that character should be a blending of deep musical thought with much tenderness and grace. Purcell's genius was indeed altogether in advance of his time. Its character was such as to show that a composer had arisen possessing the necessary genius to build up, or at least to lay the foundation of, English opera. In 1681, at the age of 23, he ventured upon his first publication—a set of sonatas. In 1690, in addition to much laborious work in connection with his appointment as organist, he appeared to have worked assiduously for the theatres, and it was at this period he produced the "Tempest," from which specimens were given by the choir. Another great work next dwelt upon was "The Prophetess, or the history of Diocletian," from which illustrations were given, and also that of "King Arthur, or the British Worthy," which was first performed in 1691. It was to be regretted that a part only of the latter opera survived. That was but an instance of his usual custom, for Purcell published almost nothing compared with what he wrote. He neglected the most ordinary precautions for the preservation of his works, as well as those which would ensure him personal emoluments by their publication. It would seem as if the view Purcell had obtained of the power and resources of his art, and his conviction of what it might hereafter accomplish, led him to regard all that he produced as but the efforts of a learner capable of giving but a brief and transient impulse to its advancement; and having accomplished this, fit only to be forgotten. After 80 years of neglect, however, that opera was revived, a fact without a parallel in the history of dramatic music.

The members of the St. George's Glee Union held their usual monthly concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 4th inst. The programme was miscellaneous, and gave great satisfaction. The artists were Miss E. Phillips, Miss J. Rosse, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Master Frank Charlton, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. In the second part of the programme the chief item was the cantata "May Day" (Macfarren), the soprano solos being well rendered by Miss Phillips. The part-singing by the choir, throughout the evening, was well up to the society's standard, and included "Now is the month of Maying" (Morley), "The Nightingale" (Mendelssohn), "Now Tramp" (Bishop), and "The Song of the Vikings" (Eaton Faning), the latter receiving an encore. The accompaniments were played by Miss Edith Mahon and Mr. F. R. Kinkee, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—The publication of the Royal Charter granted to the Royal College of Music induces me to make the following remarks, in the hope that you will give them publicity in the interests of the unsuccessful candidates for scholarships. One of my sons passed the preliminary examination, and went up for the final, as appointed, but was not successful in obtaining a scholarship. The intimation of non-success was accompanied by a suggestion from the director that "it might be worth the candidate's while to enter the College as a paying student." That, Sir, my son would be glad to do, but, unfortunately, the high fee charged and the conditions of payment render that impossible. The fee for paying students is fixed at £40 per annum, and the whole amount to be paid in advance.

Now, Sir, the latter is a prohibitory condition to most of the unsuccessful candidates. From the number of my son's receipt, I estimate that 500 candidates went up to compete for 50 scholarships, consequently there are 450 disappointed, and among that number there is probably not more than one-fifth that can afford to comply with the suggestion of the director. If the Royal College of Music is really intended to foster a love for the art among the struggling classes it must open its portals a little wider than its present prospectus indicates, and if it sincerely wishes to help the young musicians of this country to obtain a thorough training under its roof it must both reduce the fees and modify the mode of payment.

The fees as fixed at present are higher than the highest in the country, and nearly treble those of any conservatoire abroad, so that the unsuccessful candidates for scholarships are driven from the doors of the Royal College of Music, which is said to be national, to seek admission to cheaper establishments at home or in a foreign land.

The Royal College of Music might easily establish its national character, fulfil its necessary functions, and receive nearly all the unsuccessful candidates by reducing its charges, and making them payable on easier terms. Indeed there is nothing to prevent, if the governing body have the will, reducing the fees to half the fixed amount to the unsuccessful candidates, so as to keep them in good practice and training until other scholarships are open for competition, and that would be a concession that would secure the training of the most promising musical talent in the country, and make the Royal College of Music worthy of the national character it assumes.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

PATER.

Passing Events.

"David, the son of Jesse" is the title of a Scriptural operetta produced in New York on April 16th.

Miss Agnes Larkcom and Miss Clara Myers (a rising young singer) announce a morning concert on May 23rd, at 19, Harley Street, with a strong list of good artists.

The Metropolitan Opera House in New York, one of the largest theatres in the world, is rapidly approaching completion. A roomy seating is a welcome feature of the new house.

The authorities of the Tonic Sol-fa College have invited the Cologne Choir to a breakfast at Exeter Hall during their forthcoming visit. The kindly thought of invitation has been accepted.

Messrs. Wadsworth, Brothers, of Manchester, have just built an effective organ at Brighouse, Leeds. It was opened by Dr. W. Creser, Mr. S. E. Woxton playing on the following Sunday.

Dr. Creser's cantata "Eudora" was performed at Newcastle last week, the composer himself conducting. The local press speaks most highly of the work itself as well as of the performance.

The Guildhall School of Music gave on the 5th an excellently rendered concert at the Mansion House under the experienced direction of the principal, Mr. H. Weist Hill.

Mr. Goring Thomas's opera "Esmeralda," is to be given at the Stadt Theatre, Cologne, in the autumn. English music is now finding acceptance on the continent pretty freely.

Herr Max Bruch has recently conducted some of his own music in New York with success. Balfe's "Satanella" was to be revived in New York on May 7th.

An excellent institution in its way, the "Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte Playing," held its ninth annual students' concert at the Marlborough Rooms on the 5th inst. President, Mr. Franklin Taylor; Director, Mr. Oscar Beringer.

The Kyrle Society gave an efficient rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at Christ Church, Poplar, on the 2nd; Mr. Probert and Mr. A. G. Herbert artistically took the tenor and bass parts. Mr. M. L. Lawson conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners propose a codification and issue of fresh regulations for the governance of the St. Paul's Cathedral staff. In the event of this scheme being adopted, the Corporation of the Vicars Choral will be dissolved.

The large and fine new organ built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster in the stately old parish church of Bakewell, Derbyshire, was opened on the 10th. A choral service was celebrated in the morning. In the afternoon Mr. E. H. Turpin gave a recital. In the evening another choral service was held at which Mr. T. B. Mellor, the organist of the church, was the player.

Music appears to be a prominent plank in the eccentric platform of the Salvation Army people. "General" Booth has stated that the army had 45 paid bandmasters, and 250 bands. As within the last nine months £9,000 has been spent in the purchase of instruments, it is evident that the movement has been of considerable value to the manufacturers of musical instruments.

At the last concert of the Brousil family, on May 3rd, Miss Wurm repeated her fine Sonata in G for pianoforte and violoncello (Mr. J. A. Brousil). The work, already discussed, improves on acquaintance and is in every respect creditable to Mdme. Schumann's accomplished pupil. Miss B. Brousil, her brother, and Miss Wurms gave a capital reading of Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat. Op. 97.

An excellent concert was given on the 7th in aid of the Choir Fund of St. Jude's Church, Grays Inn Road. Miss Thudichum and Miss Ida Igguiden of the R.A.M. assisted as principal singers. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Ford, the able and much esteemed organist of St. Jude's, who has done much to advance the interests of the choir and to improve the musical services of the Church. Mr. Ernest Ford played the accompaniments very artistically. The choir sang several part-songs, and the listeners were much gratified.

At the 7th concert of the West London College of Music, at No. 31, Colville Gardens, on the evening of May 3rd, Miss Lynn distinguished herself both as pianist and singer, choosing the "Sonata Pathétique," and the air, "O mio Fernando." Miss Josephine Agabeg played most artistically Chopin's Polonaise in A flat and a Rhapsody of Liszt. Miss E. Dashwood, has a clear soprano, and tastefully sang "Couvien partir" from "La Figlio del Reggimento," also a lied of Jaubert. Mr. Warre, a fine baritone, sang Mr. Hall's "Vanity," and Mrs. Shipway won a bis for "Tit for Tat." Mr. Beresford, a professor of the violin at the College, gave a fine rendering of Ernst's "Carnaval de Venise." Some fine part-singing relieved the solos.

Mr. Charles Mackeson's valuable "Guide to the London Churches" is now out. Year by year this useful compilation is full of renewed interest. The Guide contains particulars of some 928 churches. For statistical purposes of comparison, the number is corrected to 920. As regards music the following calculations are highly interesting. In 379 churches, more than two-fifths, the service is fully choral, and in 316, more than one-third, it is partly choral; so that in 695 churches, or three-fourths, there is a musical service more or less elaborate. The Gregorian tones are used for chanting in 133, one-seventh; the choir is paid in 254, more than one-fourth, and voluntary in 477, more than half, the choir in the remaining one-fourth being partly paid or partly voluntary, or consisting of school children. In 502 churches, considerably more than half, the choir is surpliced. A new feature of the book is an index to the work done by the organ builders in the London churches.

CHOPIN IN SOCIETY.

[Translated from the Deutsche Musiker Zeitung, by Miss Edith E. Southgate].

The Marquis de Custine, of Prague, celebrated for his many literary works, the best known of which is that on Russia, possessed a large fortune, an aristocratic name, and inhabited a splendid mansion in Paris. At the brilliant soirées he gave, one met the greatest artists and foremost men of science in the French capital. I cannot quite remember, relates Friedrich von Flotow in his "Recollections," how I, at that time unknown as I was, received an invitation to that circle of renowned and eclectic people. I only knew the Marquis by name, and was quite a stranger to him. The well-known French fashion of a servant announcing the name of each guest upon his entrance into the drawing-room would, I knew, help me to a certain extent to learn the names of the distinguished persons who were to appear. In order that I should succeed in this, I determined to be one of the first to enter the Hotel de Custine. I was the first, and was so early, indeed, that there was not even a servant present in the anteroom, and I walked into the drawing-room without being announced. I told my name to the friendly Marquis, who advanced towards me, and introduced myself as a German. He perceived my embarrassment, and came at once to my help, praising the punctuality of my countrymen in general, and above all that of the German artists. They certainly never seek to produce a sensation in a drawing-room, through an affected late appearance.

After a short time the arrivals commenced, and I heard the name of Horace Vernet, the celebrated battlefield painter; he looked like a Bedouin sheik, so dark was the colour of his face. Then came Baron Marochetti, the sculptor, a young but already famed artist; Graaf von Nieuwerkerke, his colleague; the sea painter, Gudin; Tissot, professor and member of the Institut de France; Balzac the author; Appert, who, through his active exertions to better the French prisons, received the name of "Bienfaiteur des prisonniers"; Artot the violin player, and Franchomme the violoncellist.

At last I heard the name of Chopin announced, and my entire interest became centred in him. He appeared to me suffering and nervously excited; in stature he was large, but at the same time painfully thin. He quickly approached the Marquis, and I heard him ask quietly, "Is she coming?" "I hope so," was the answer. I asked of a gentleman standing near me who this referred to. "Do you not know," was the reply, "that the Baroness Dudevant is expected?" Finding that I was utterly ignorant as to the significance of this name, he added, "The Baroness Dudevant is the most celebrated authoress, and signs her works with the name of George Sand." This nom de plume was certainly well known to me, I had read and admired most of her works. In the course of conversation with my friendly neighbour, I discovered that George Sand had taken up the literary career in the later years of her life, and that she was separated from her husband. The well-known man of letters, Sandeau, first discovered her great talent, called her attention to it, and directed her steps up to the first stage of fame. Out of gratitude to him, she adopted the first half of his name, and signed her works with "Sand." Just at this time, I was told, she was at variance with her friend and admirer, and this was perhaps the cause of his absence at the soirée in the Hotel Custine. Whether this statement was true or not, I cannot say, but I heard later from others the same tale with little variation. Informed by the servant of fresh arrivals, the Marquis de Custine hurried away, and immediately appeared again, having a lady on his arm, the servant following behind, and with a stentorian voice announcing, "Madame George Sand." All hurried to meet her. Each wished to be the first to greet, or see, the honoured one. Here she accorded a little laugh, there friendly words, and to the special favourites she offered her hand. To the last-named category belonged Chopin. After the first excitement was over, I succeeded in obtaining a favourable place from which I could watch the distinguished authoress. She was not beautiful, and not young, I could perceive nothing out of the ordinary in her outward appearance.

The concert then began; after a few pieces had been given, Chopin was called upon to play. He seated himself at the pianoforte and performed one of his much-admired mazurkas. His friends declared that upon this evening there was a greater depth of feeling in his music than usual. I had never before heard him, so could offer no opinion; but I was enraptured with his playing. After Chopin had finished, there was a pause and then something happened which at that period was indeed most peculiar and extraordinary. George Sand demanded a cigar! Not a lady's paper cigarette, with perfumed contents; no! a real, full-sized man's cigar. Those who had lived thirty years in Paris can well understand what an impression such a demand (and especially from a lady) must have made at that time on the assembled guests of the Marquis de Custine. We young people when we approached a lady carefully avoided carrying with us even the smell of cigars. We did not even smoke in the morning, when we intended going into society the same evening. Since that period it is indeed, otherwise in Paris.

The cigar which George Sand had desired was brought. The door which led to the garden of the mansion was opened, and the "performance" began. Furnished with hat and cloak (for it was cool outside), the celebrated lady without anyone to attend her, walked up and down puffing mighty clouds of smoke in the air. Unconcerned she stood the glance of hundreds of eyes, which were directed on her through the windows. The young ladies found it original, the elders unfitting; the young men were enchanted, the married men were uneasy, chiefly on account of the bad example. Everything in the world comes to an end, and so did the cigar of Madame Sand. She threw the fragment left on one side, and returned to the company.

Chopin was now called upon to play something. At first he declined, but afterwards he declared himself ready to improvise; an universal bravo rewarded him in advance. He was about to begin, when he suddenly got up, and whispered to the Marquis that his inspiration could only be created by the eyes of the celebrated authoress; she was to be asked to sit opposite him. George Sand granted his request, and took a seat at the end of the piano; she gave a long look at the musical improvisator, which the latter answered, and began. The remaining mortals, or immortals, stood or sat in a circle around. Expectations were raised to the highest. Since that evening forty years have fled, nevertheless I remember Chopin's improvisation as if I had only heard it yesterday. He began with the lowest bass notes of the pianoforte, and by judicious employment of the pedal worked up a stormy roll, leading into a tender melody in the minor; the whole concluded with a very brilliant and triumphant coda. The long continued applause of his audience, and a warm shake of the hand from George Sand (who felt herself very flattered at the distinction which Chopin had thus accorded her) was the reward of the great virtuoso. He left the piano exhausted and languid. The guests departed, and I took leave, delighted to have found in the Marquis de Custine an accomplished gentleman, to have heard the celebrated Chopin, and to have seen the most famous authoress of France smoke a cigar.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—The new musical college—musical university it may almost be called, since it has the power of conferring degrees—will, for so long as it exists, remain identified with the name of its founder and patron, the Prince of Wales. Indeed, he is more than its patron and founder—he has displayed in its cause a persevering energy, and power of organising, that ought to assure to any institution a successful start. But, without prejudice to Dr. Grove, the director, or to Dr. Sullivan, as representing the training school now merged in the new college, the most graceful act of the occasion was the announcement, that one of the three new knights is to be Dr. Macfarren. Unquestionably, if the Royal Academy of Music, which he represents, had received some fragments of the money and influence which has been showered upon the new institution, the Royal College of Music would have been little needed, had it been needed at all. People often talk as if England had been till now without the machinery for producing good musicians. In truth, she has long possessed an admirable machine—it is the money and the influence that alone have been wanting. The pittance of a very few hundreds a year, which has been grudgingly given to the Royal Academy, has been earned a thousand-fold; and it is well, therefore, that the original school of nearly all the English musicians of distinction whom we have had for some 60 years should not, on the occasion of yesterday, have been wholly forgotten. If the Royal Academy has done so much without aid, there is no limit to what the Royal College ought to do.—Globe.

Conductor .. .. AUGUST MANNS.

To the London Philharmonic we owe a deep debt of gratitude, for the first performance in this country of the "Choral Symphony." In March, 1823, this fine old society gave Beethoven fifty pounds for the use of the manuscript for a limited time, and it was performed by them in London in 1825. The Viennese public however, much to the disappointment of our Philharmonic, had first the honour of hearing it in 1824, at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. In speaking of the progress of orchestral music in this country during the past fifty years, Professor Macfarren stated last year, on the interesting occasion of the presentation of Mr. Manns' testimonial, at the Crystal Palace, that although this great symphony had in years past been creditably performed in London on several occasions, it remained for Mr. Manns and the Crystal Palace orchestra to make it better understood, and more thoroughly appreciated than it had been. We owe to them therefore an equal debt of gratitude with the Philharmonic, for most of us remember when even the majority of musicians looked upon it as a strange and unintelligible thing, a kind of poem reconditum and æsthetic problem.

The performance, on Saturday last was very satisfactory as far as the orchestra was concerned, but the vocal parts left much to be desired. The quartet voices were individually good, but many of the most beautiful passages were marred from want of consentaneousness; and in the chorus parts a few additional high and fresh treble voices would have been acceptable.

Dvorak's Concert-Overture was another beautiful specimen of this gifted man. It is full of brightness and enthusiasm, and made a most favourable impression.

I have again to record a decided success by the very young and talented violinist, Signorina Teresina Tua. The grace and freedom of her bearing, her marvellous execution, and her tender expression, produced a very marked effect upon her audience.

It may be well to state that the next Saturday concert will not take place until the 26th of May, when Berlioz's "Grand Messe des Marts," will be performed for the first time in England. One may hope that on this occasion the directors may think fit to make use of the great Handel orchestra, not only for the comfort of the audience, but to prevent the overcrowding of performers in the concert-room orchestra, as a much greater number of instruments must be employed, and probably a much larger choir. Another contributor writes:—

Mr. Manns may be congratulated on a capital performance of the "Choral Symphony" last Saturday. It were well, however, as Spohr opined, if the long work terminated with the three masterly orchestral movements. The choral part, generally rendered in a style the reverse of satisfactory, is quite an anti-climax, and Mr. John Oxenford's unhappy version of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," still does duty at Sydenham, if not elsewhere. "Here's a kiss for everyone," sounds rather school-girlish; and to rhyme "millions" with "pavilion," reminds one of a certain libretto recently put before the public.

Signorina Tua played with taste and mastery of mécanique De Beriot's violin concerto. Ernst's Hungarian airs, in nowise remarkable, were also executed with clearness and taste. Considering the limited repertoire of violin (solo) music, De Beriot, Kreutzer, and Meyseder might be more frequently heard. The inevitable "Spanish dance" was played by Mdlle. Tua on a bis. A. THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The programme of the fifth concert, given on the evening of the 9th inst., was open to objection on account of its length. It is true the directors had provided a banquet of dainties. But Solomon declares that dainties are oft "deceitful meats," and the surfeits that are likely to ensue from over-indulgence of them, so far as a long course of concert listening is concerned, renders probable the literal fulfilment of Shakespeare's dictum:—

"Surfeited grooms
Do mock their charge with snores."

The scheme was as under:—

Beethoven's ever fresh and delightful Pastoral gives one new pleasure, and fresh interest in its manifold beauties, each time that the masterpiece is heard. It presents indeed a perfect exemplification of the maxim, Ars celare artem. So simple does the score for the most part appear, that a hasty perusal, or a listless hearing, might lead one to imagine that the production was little more than a slight piece of agreeable music. But when the thoughtful student looks below the pleasing surface of this "expression of feeling, rather than a painting," as its author expressly terms it, he will find hidden the most consummate art. The genius of the great tone-poet carries us away with him into the country, and as we drink in the fresh air we listen to the sweet songs of the birds, observe the simple gaiety of the country-folk, perceive with awe and wonder the terrible storm, and join with the herdsmen in their thankful feelings after the tempest is over. Despite Beethoven's appropriations of woodland minstrelsy in the express reproductions of the songs of the yellow-hammer, nightingale, quail and cuckoo, there is no realism in the whole work. He has but taken these fragments as themes for treatment; so intertwined are they with the logical sequence of the movement, that they form an integral part of it, variegating it with beautiful and vivid colouring. None but a true genius artist could have so successfully blended such unrhythmical elements, with the strict texture of scientific music. The culminating point of the storm, coincident with the grand introduction of the trombones, just after the steady chromatic descent of the bass, is perhaps the most sublime thing the master has written. And then after the depth of the gloom, how singularly bright and hopeful is the broad theme of the oboes and flute, giving the first ray of sunshine and glad thankfulness! There are other symphonies of Beethoven more ambitious than the "Pastoral," but none that show more skill, or deeper human sympathy than this vivid picture of country-life exhibits. The symphony is one requiring great care in its performance. Its delicate points and varieties of sentiments were satisfactorily brought out by the band under Mr. Cusins' careful direction.

Cherubini's Motet in F, which was performed for the first time in England, was written in 1818 for the French Chapel Royal. The original score was acquired by the late Prince Consort, and it was graciously lent by the Queen from the Buckingham Palace library for performance. The work is written for tenor solo, four-part chorus, and full orchestra. It reflects throughout the religious and elevated spirit of the great Florentine's sacred music. The opening solo, "Adjutor in opportunitatibus," a smooth piece of writing, leads into two choruses; in the second of these, to the words, "De profundis clamavi," the choir sing (in F minor) some short detached chords, remarkable for the tone of heartfelt sorrow they express. The final chorus, "Quia apud te propitiatis," forms a skilfully written and florid conclusion to the motet. The orchestration of the work is deliciously coloured, and exhibits that fertility of resource and refined skill so characteristic of Cherubini's scoring. Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, No. 1, in G minor, is a work of a different nature to that of the ridiculous Scotch fantasia, which recently set the Philharmonic audience laughing. It cannot, however, take rank as a fine composition; but considering the somewhat limited repertoire of concertos for the violin, it will find acceptance as worthy to be occasionally heard. Its themes are for the most part heavy and uninspired, and there is a great sameness about the tone of its orchestral setting. What little impetuosity it possesses, seems rather to be manufactured, than to grow spontaneously out of the texture itself. Still, there is musicianly work in it, but scholarship does not make up for want of inspiration. The concerto served to introduce to a London audience Signorina Teresina Tua, a young lady of some seventeen summers, who comes to us with a great, and, apparently, well-deserved reputation from the continent. Her playing of this (and the subsequent solo, Raff's beautiful "Cavatina") was an exact reflection of the mode of singing current among the best artists of her native land. It was marked by the same passion, excessive refinement, and sympathy that is to be found there. Young as she is, she has already studied to such good purpose, that she has apparently mastered all technical difficulties, and acquired a pure, silvery, if not large, volume of tone. Her bowing is free, and her stopping singularly accurate. Although she plays with great brilliancy, and dash enough almost to startle one, yet she exhibits those little touches of delicate fancy, rubato, and exquisite expression that mark the intelligent sympathetic artist. Her dynamic power is as yet naturally limited, but from that shown in the double stops, it promises to be as satisfactory as are her other qualities. Until one has heard Signorina Tua play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, or in a Beethoven quartet, it is not easy to fix the precise place she is entitled to in violin hierarchy, but it promises to be a high one. She must have worked up Sarasate's "Spanish Dance" since she came over here; her rendering of it was a clever imitation of the style of its author, and it was played with just that zest and abandon which he exhibits.

Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral piece, "La belle dame sans merci," is inspired by Keats's beautiful words. The piece has but just been written for the Philharmonic Society. Why the author should term it a "ballad for orchestra," is difficult to discover. Editors of musical dictionaries will henceforth have to add a new meaning to the old appellation. Herr Hüffer (the writer of the Society's programme books) says, but few remarks should be expected from "a discreet analyst," so that the audience is left in doubt as to the particular portions of the tale sought to be illustrated. From a certain point of view, however, this is as well; the listeners then have the advantage of exercising their imaginations, and it takes the piece out of the comparative low category of "programme" music. Mr. Mackenzie's work belongs rather to the class of illustrative tone-pictures, of which Mendelssohn's "Calm sea and prosperous voyage," Wagner's "Siegfried's death march," and our own countryman, Sterndale Bennett's ethereal "Paradise and the Peri" overture belong. Mr. Mackenzie's deep and expressive music requires more than a single hearing in order to appreciate it, but apparently it is an advance on anything that the gifted author of "Columba" has yet written. From its impressive opening phrase for the 'cello, to the closing clever and picturesque working out of a remarkable agitated theme first enunciated on the oboe, the ballad is full of the highest and unflagging interest. The poetry of this music, the breadth of its melodic phrases, as well as the technical skill shown over its workmanship, will become more and better appreciated on a second hearing. Mr. Cusins gracefully resigned the bâton to the composer, under whose direction the work was carefully given.

One of the few of Chopin's friends left, himself a distinguished musician, declared that to hear M. Vladimir de Pachmann play, was to listen to the wonderful Pole himself. And we of this generation who have not heard Chopin, but have listened to many of his interpreters, can quite believe that this is true. M. Pachmann is evidently one of the very few who possess the gift of entire sympathy with the ideas and feelings of his renowned countryman. His playing has been already so carefully analysed and described, that it is needless to dwell upon its features. Chopin's F minor concerto, in which are to be found some of his happiest thoughts, most exquisite embroidery, surprising modulations, and untrammelled passion, found indeed a sympathetic player in M. de Pachmann. Specially commendable in his playing is the fact—unhappily rare to chronicle in these days—that he never thumps the keys. All grades of tone and necessary power are obtained without descending to this blacksmith-like resort.
